to the Viceroy to debate that matter. But the Viceroy being dead at Caietta when the Generall arriued, he was to transferre the negociation of that affaire to Don Hugo de Moncada, to whom the Emperours commiſſion did alſo extend, and whom the Viceroy had ſubſtituted in his place vntill the Emperour ſhould take ſome other order for the gouernment of the Realme: and when the Generall had communicated with Don Hugo, he went to Rome in the companie of Miglian, who was come out of Spaine with the like commiſſions. This buſineſſe contained two principall articles; the one, that the Pope ſhould ſatisfie the armie, to whom was owing a very great ſumme of money; and the other, that the Pope being deliuered, ſhould not adhere to his enemies: and herein he propounded very hard conditions, of hoſtages and townes for aſſurance. By reaſon of theſe difficulties the matter was long in debating, the which to make more eaſie, the Pope had often ſolicited Monſieur Lautrech, and continually did ſolicite him (although ſecretly) to aduance, aſſuring him that his intention was to promiſe nothing to the Imperials, but by force; and that in that caſe, being once out of priſon he would obſerue nothing, ſo ſoone as his perſon were once come into a place of ſuretie, which he ſought to bring to paſſe, in giuing to them the leaſt oportunitie he could: but in caſe he did accord, he beſought him that the compaſſion of his aduerſities and neceſſities might ſerue him for excuſe; which matter whileſt it was in ſolicitation, the hoſtages ſtole away ſecretly from Rome in the end of Nouember, not without the great indignation of the Lanceknights.

Long was the diſputation vpon this matter, thoſe alſo that were to determine it being not of one opinion. For Don Hugo, although he had ſent to Rome Serenon his Secretarie, together with others, yet what for his ill nature, and the litle loue he bare to the Pope, he had no great inclination thereunto: and the Generall quite contrary, for the deſire he had to be Cardinall. Miglian impugned it, as a matter moſt dangerous for the Emperour; and being not able to reſiſt, he went to Naples; of which impietie he bare the puniſhment, for that at the firſt beſieging of Naples, in skirmiſhing he was ſlaine with the ſhot of an harquebuze. The Pope alſo was not wanting to himſelfe, for he allured to his opinion, and wonne on his ſide Ierom Moron, whoſe counſels were of great authoritie with the Imperials in all their deliberations. The meanes was, that he conferred the Biſhopricke of Modena vpon his ſonne, and promiſed him certaine corne which he had at Cornetta, which was worth more then twelue thouſand duckats: and he made the Cardinall Colonno tractable thereunto with no leſſe induſtrie, promiſing him the legation of la Marqua, and giuing him to vnderſtand, at ſuch time as he came to viſite him in the Caſtle, that he would be beholding principally to him for ſo great a benefite: and artificially diſtilling into his eares that he could deſire no greater glorie and felicitie, then to make knowne to all the world that it was in his power to pull downe Popes, and in his hand, when they were deiected and brought to nothing, to cauſe them to returne to their former greatneſſe: with which inſinuations this Cardinall being moued, who by nature was very much puffed vp and haughtie, did readily helpe forward his deliuerance, beleeuing that it would be as eaſie for the Pope being deliuered to forget ſo many iniuries, as it had bene eaſie for him with prayers and teares humbly to commend vnto him his deliuerance. But the difficulties were ſomewhat eaſed by a new commiſſion from the Emperour, by the which he gaue expreſſe order, that the Pope ſhould be deliuered to his contentment as much as was poſſible, adding that it ſufficed him, that being at libertie, he would be no more for the Confederates then for him. But it was beleeued that the matter that wrought his deliuerie, aboue all other things, was a neceſſitie they had, for feare of the coming of Monſieur Lautrech, to leade their armie to the defence of the Realme of Naples: which was a matter impoſſible, vnleſſe they were firſt aſſured of the payes that were due to them, in recompence whereof they refuſed to admit ſo many pillages and great gaines they had made at the ſame time. This neceſſitie to prouide payes, was the cauſe alſo why there was made leſſe account to be aſſured of the Pope in time to come. At laſt, after long negociation, there was concluded in Rome the laſt day of October, a concluſion of accord with the Generall and Serenon, in the name of Don Hugo, who ratified it afterwards: That the Pope ſhould make no enterpriſe againſt the Emperour, as well in regard of the affaires of Millan, as thoſe of the kingdome of Naples: That he ſhould accord vnto him the Croyſado in Spaine, and a tenth of the reuenues Eccleſiaſtike through all thoſe Realmes: That for aſſurance of the obſeruation, Oſtia ſhould remaine in the hands of the Emperour, Accord betweene the Pope and the Emperours Agents.

Emperour, and Ciuitauecchia which Andrew Dore had left to him before: That he should consigne vnto him Ciuita Castellana, which towne had refused to receiue the Imperials; Mario Perusquo Proctor of the fiske being entred within the Rocke by secret commission from the Pope, notwithstanding he made semblance of the contrary: That he should also deliuer vp to him the Rocke of Furly, and giue for hostages Hippolito and Alexander his nephewes, and vntill they were come from Parma, the Cardinals Pisani, Triuulce and Gaddi, whom they led to the realme of Naples: That he should presently pay to the Lanceknights threescore and seuen thousand duckats, and to the Spaniards fiue and thirtie thousand: That in so doing they should release him together with all the Cardinals, and they should go out of Rome and the Castle, accounting it libertie when they should be conueyed in safetie to Oruietta, Spoleto, or Perousa: That within fifteene dayes after their going out of Rome he should pay the like quantitie of money againe to the Lanceknights, and that he should pay the rest afterwards within three moneths to the Spaniards and Lanceknights, according to their portions, which residue together with the summes payed, amounted to more then three hundred & fiftie thousand duckats. Which things that the Pope might the better obserues & to the end to get his liberty, he had recourse to those remedies which he would not vse before to keepe him out of prison: in so much as he created for money certaine Cardinals, of whom the most part were vnworthy of so great honour; and for the rest he agreed for the tenths of the Realme of Naples, with power to alienate the goods of the Church: in so much as that which was dedicated to the seruice of God (so deepe and profound are his iudgements) was conuerted to the vse and entertainment of Heretickes, & that by the permission and consent of the Vicar of Christ. With which meanes hauing assured them of the payments at the times promised, he deliuered also in hostage for the suretie of the souldiers, the Cardinals Gesti and Vrsin, who were led by the Cardinall Colonno to Grottaferrata. All things being performed, and resolued that the tenth day of December the Spaniards should accompanie him into a place of suretie, he fearing some variation, either for the ill mind which he knew Don Hugo bare to him, or for any other accident that might happen, the night before he stole secretly out of the Castle in the closing of the euening, in the habite of a Merchant: and Lewis de Gonsaga who was in the pay of the Imperials, and taried for him in the medowes with a strong companie of harquebuziers, accompanied him to Montfalcon, where dismissing almost all his footmen, the same Lewis accompanied him euen to Oruietta, into which Citie he entred by night, without the companie of any of the Cardinals; an example certainly very considerable, and perhaps neuer happened since the Church was great, that a Pope should fall from so great a puissance and reuerence, to lose Rome, himselfe to be in captiuitie, and his whole estate reduced to the disposing of another, and within few moneths after, to be set at libertie, and all that had bin taken from him restored, to returne almost as sodainly to his former greatnes: so great is the authoritie of the Pope with Christiã Princes, & such the respect which all men beare to him. The Pope goeth out of prison.

At this time when Monsieur Lautrech was departed from Plaisance, Anthonie de Leua sent out of Millan the bands of Spanish and Italian footmen, to feed and refresh themselues, and also to recouer such places of the country as were most weak, to the end to open a way to bring victuals to Millan: and they tooke that part of the country which is called Sepri. He sent also Philip Torniello with twelue hundred footmen and certaine horsemen to Nouaro, in which Citie was a garrison of foure hundred footmen of the Duke of Millan. Torniello made his entrie by the Rocke, which had bene alwayes holden in the name of the Emperour, and finding a very slender defence, he made himselfe maister of the towne, and the footmen being stripped and sent home to their houses, he remained within Nouaro to ouerrunne the countrey thereabouts. But part of the Lanceknights were got into Arona, and others into Mortara, to whom the Duke hauing sent other footmen for the defence of Lomellina and the countrey adioyning, Torniello could not make his incursions farre off: so that doing no other exploits that Winter then many skirmishes, both parts made pillage as well of their friends as their enemies, to the vniuersall ruine of all the countrey. In like sort at that time were ioyned and reassembled at Liuorne the galleys of Andrew Dore, and foureteene French galleys, with the sixteene galleys of the Venetians: who after they had receiued in Ranse de Cere with three thousand footmen to put on land, they departed the thirteenth day of Nouember from the port of Liuorne: and albeit it was determined before, that they should inuade the Ile of Sicile, yet changing counsell, they turned to the enterprise of Sardignia, at the perswasion (as was supposed) of Andrew Dore, who haply had in his mind other con-conception. Monſieur Lautrech conſented to this enterpriſe, hoping that Sardignia being taken, the conqueſt of Sicile would be of leſſe difficultie. But whatſoeuer the cauſe was, the galleys being horribly toſſed with a very violent ſtorme, were ſeparated, and went floating vpon the ſea. One of the French galleys periſhed neare the ſhores of Sardignia, & foure of the Venetians being ſore weather beaten, returned to Liuorne. The other French galleys were driuen into Corſica by the rage of the winds, where afterwards foure Venetian galleys ioyned with them in Portouecchio: and the other eight of the Venetians were tranſported to Liuorne. Finally the enterpriſe was to no purpoſe. Andrew Doria and Ranſe de Cere remaining at great diſcord together. But Monſieur Lautrech, who whileſt he was in Reggio, being aduertiſed of the Popes deliuerie, leauing the Caſtle of Parma to the officers of the Church, he went to Bolognia, and ſtayed there, expecting the comming of the bands of the Lanceknights, who within a few dayes after arriued in the country of Bolognia, not fiue thouſand in number, as was appointed, but onely three thouſand. And neuertheleſſe after they were arriued, Monſieur Lautrech ſoiourned twentie dayes within Bolognia, attending the Kings aduertiſement for the laſt reſolution touching the negociation of the peace: and vſing in the meane while great diligence (wherein was alſo interpoſed the authoritie of the King of England) to induce the Pope to adhere to the Confederates: at whoſe firſt coming to Quietta, the Duke of Vrbin, the Marquis of Saluſſa, Federike de Boſſolo, who died a litle after at Telo, and Lemio Piſano the Venetian Commiſſarie, coming thither to congratulate him, he inſtantly intreated them to retire their companies from off the lands of the Church, aſſuring them that the Imperials had promiſed him to depart thence, if the Confederates would do the like. He wrote alſo a letter to Monſieur Lautrech, wherein he gaue him thankes for that which he had done for his deliuerance, and in that he had counſelled him to free himſelfe in any ſort whatſoeuer: and he expreſſed in the ſaid letter, that his actions had bene of ſo great conſequence to conſtraine the Imperials to reſolue vpon his deliuerie, that he acknowledged himſelfe no leſſe bound to the King and to him for it, then if he had bene freed by the force of their armies: the proceedings whereof he would willingly haue attended, had not his neceſſitie compelled him, for that the conditions that were propounded were alwayes changed from ill to worſe, and for that he perceiued plainly that he could not obtaine his deliuerie by any other meanes then by accord: the which by how much the more it was deferred, by ſo much the more was the authoritie and eſtate of the Church troden vnder foote: but the chiefeſt matter that had induced him, was the hope that he might be a fit inſtrument to ſolicite with his King and the other Chriſtian Princes the common good. Such were at the firſt his ſpeeches, plaine and ſimple, as well became the office of a Biſhop, but eſpecially a Pope, who had receiued at the hands of God ſo ſeuere and ſharpe admonitions. Neuertheleſſe retaining his accuſtomed nature, and hauing not left for his impriſonment, either his ſubtilties or his couetouſneſſe, when the Agents which Monſieur Lautrech ſent, together with Gregorie Caſale Embaſſador of the King of England, were come vnto him to intreate him to confederate with the reſidue (which was in the beginning of the yeare 1528,) he began to giue them diuers anſwers, ſometimes giuing them hope, and ſometimes excuſing himſelfe, that hauing neither men, money, nor authoritie, it would do them ſmall pleaſure to haue him ioyne with them, and yet might be very preiudiciall to himſelf, for that he ſhould giue cauſe to the Imperials to offend him in many places: and ſometimes making ſhew that he would ſatisfie their demands, if Monſieur Lautrech would aduance; a matter that was deſired greatly, to the end the Lanceknights might be compelled to depart out of Rome, who conſuming the remainder of that miſerable Citie, and of all the countrey confining, and yeelding no obedience to their Captaines, and raiſing tumults oftentimes among themſelues, would not depart thence, but demanded new payes.

8. But from the end of the yeare precedent, and much more in the beginning of this yeare, the ſolicitations of peace began manifeſtly to appeare vaine, by reaſon whereof the minds of Princes and States began to be much more incenſed. For all the difficulties being in a maner reſolued, ſeeing the Emperour refuſed not to render to Francis Sforce the Duchie of Millan, and to compound with the Venetians, the Florentines, and the other Confederates, there reſted onely in queſtion, which of theſe two things ſhould be firſt put in execution, either the withdrawing of the French kings armie out of Italy, or the reſtitution of his children: the King would not be bound to reuoke his armie out of Italy, if he recouered not his childrē firſt, offering to put hoſtages into the hands of the King of England, to aſſure the obſeruation of the penalties where-

in he was bound, if when he ſhould haue receiued his children, he did not preſently retire his armie. The Emperour made inſtance to the contrary, offering the ſame cautions into the King of Englands hands: and diſputing among themſelues which of them ought moſt firſt to truſt the other, the Emperour ſaid, he could not truſt him that had once deceiued him: whereunto the French Embaſſadours anſwered, that by how much more he pretended to be deceiued by their King, by ſo much ẏ leſſe could their King repoſe confidence in him: and that the Empetors offer to conſigne into the hands of the King of England the ſame aſſurances which their King offered, was no equall offer: for that the caſe alſo was not alike, ſeeing that which the Emperour promiſed to do, was of farre greater conſequence then that which the King promiſed, and therefore the ſame cautions aſſured him not: and at the laſt they added, that the Engliſh Embaſſadours, who had authoritie fron their King to bind him to obſerue whatſoeuer the French king ſhould promiſe, had no commiſſion to tie him to obſerue that which the Emperour promiſed: and that their faculties being limited, and reſtrained to time, they could neither exceed nor attend: vpon which diſputation there was found no reſolution. For the Emperour had not the ſame inclination to peace which his Counſell had, by reaſon of the opinion he had, that though he ſhould loſe the kingdome of Naples, yet he could recouer it by rendring the children of France: and it was much imputed to the great Chancellor, who long before was returned into Spaine, that he had troubled the practiſes of peace with cauillations and ſophiſticall interpretations. At length the Embaſſadors of England and France determined (following their commiſſions in caſe they deſpaired of the accord) to demand leaue of the Emperour to depart, and then immediatly to cauſe warre to be denounced againſt him: with which concluſion preſenting themſelues the xxj. day of Ianuarie before the Emperour, his Court being then at Burgos, and being followed by the Embaſſadours of Venice, of the Duke of Millan and the Florentines, the Engliſh Embaſſadours demanded of him the foure hundred and fiftie thouſand duckats which their King had lent him, and ſixe hundred thouſand for the penaltie he had incurred becauſe he had refuſed his daughter, together with fiue hundred thouſand, for the penſions of the French king and other cauſes. Which demands being propounded for the greater iuſtification, all the Embaſſadours of the Confederates asked leaue to depart: to whom he ſaid, he would ſpeake with his Counſell to conſider of an anſwer, but withall it was neceſſary before their departure, that his Embaſſadours were in places of ſuretie. Now when the Embaſſadours were departed from his preſence, the Heralds of England and France entred preſently to denounce warre againſt him, which he willingly accepting, gaue direction that the Embaſſadours of France, Venice and Florence ſhould be conueyed to a towne fifteene leagues from the Court, where a guard of archers and halberdiers being ſet ouer them, they were forbidden to communicate or write any thing whatſoeuer: and touching the Duke of Millans Embaſſadour, he impoſed vpon him a commandement, as vpon his ſubiect, not to depart from his Court: but on the behalfe of the Embaſſadour of England, there was nothing innouated.

War denounced againſt the Emperour by the kings of England and France.

Thus all treatie of peace being broken off, the fire kindled, & men thought now of nothing elſe but war, which was prepared and acted all in Italy; where Monſieur Lautrech incited by his King, but much more by the King of England, ſince the hope of peace began to diminiſh, was departed from Bologna the ninth day of Ianuarie, to go to the Realme of Naples by the way of Romagna and the Marque: which way, after long conſultation, was choſen by him, contrary to the inſtance of the Pope, who deſired by the occaſion of his marching, to reſtore into Sienna, Fabio Petrucci and the Monte Nouoes: and alſo againſt the inſtance of the Florentines, who deſired him to take that way, to the end his armie might be more readie to ſuccour them in caſe the Imperials, to diuert him, came to inuade Tuſcan. But Monſieur Lautrech choſe rather to make his entrie into the Realme of Naples by the way of Tronto, becauſe that way was more commodious to leade the artilleries, and yeelded more plentie of victuals: and to the end alſo not to giue occaſion to the enemies to make head at Sienna, or in any other place, deſiring to enter the Realme of Naples before he ſhould meete with any impediment. Now when he was departed from Bologna, Iohn Saſſatello rendred to the Pope the Rocke of Imola, whereof he had made himſelfe Lord in the time of his impriſonment: and afterwards drawing neare to Rimini, Sigiſmund Malateſta ſonne to Pandolfe, contracted with him to giue vp that Citie to the Pope, vpon condition that he ſhould be bound to ſuffer his mother to enioy her dowrie, to giue his ſiſter which was not maried ſixe thouſand duckats, and to aſſigne for his father and for him two thouſand duckats of reuenue:

That Sigiſmund ſhould depart immediatly out of Rimini, and his father to remaine there vntill the Pope had ſent the ratification: and that in the meane while the Rocke ſhould abide in the hands of Guido Rangon his couſin, who being in the pay of the French king, followed Monſieur Lautrech in the warre. But the Pope deferring to accompliſh theſe promiſes, Sigiſmund occupied againe the Rocke, though not without great complaint of the Pope againſt Guido Rangon, as though he had ſecretly ſuffered him, and not without ſuſpition alſo that Monſieur Lautrech and the Venetians had conſented thereto, as if they had deſired to keepe him in continuall difficulties; the Venetians, becauſe of Rauenna, the which when the Pope as ſoone as he was deliuered out of the Caſtle, had ſent to demand of the Senate by the Archbiſhop of Siponto, he was anſwered with generall words, referring the matter to the arbitration of Iaſper Contarin Embaſſadour elect reſident with him. For notwithſtanding they had before aſſured that they retained it for the Sea Apoſtolike, yet they had no deſire to reſtore it, being moued as well by publike as priuate intereſts, becauſe that Citie was very conuenient to augment their iuriſdiction in Romagnia, fertill of it ſelfe in graine, and which for the fertilitie of the countries adioyning, gaue opportunitie to draw to Venice euery yeare good quantities of corne: many of the Citie of Venice hauing alſo in that territorie great poſſeſſions. Touching Monſieur Lautrech, the Pope ſtood in doubt of him, for that Monſieur Lautrech beſides many inſtances which he had made vnto him before, had ſent vnto him after he was come from Bologna, Monſieur Vaudemont Captaine generall of all the Lanceknights, together with Monſieur Longueuille, whom the King ſent to ſolicite him earneſtly to declare againſt the Emperour: the which though he might ſafely haue done, by reaſon of the armie which approched; yet he could not obtaine it of him, the Pope not refuſing expreſly, but deferring and excuſing himſelfe: for which cauſe he offered to the French King to giue his conſent, but vnder this condition, that the Venetians ſhould render to him Rauenna; which condition he knew could not take effect, for that it behoued not the Venetians to be induced thereto by the Kings perſwaſions, and the time not ſuffering that the King ſhould make them his enemies to ſatisfie the Pope. Hereunto was added, that he gaue no eare to the inſtance which Monſieur Lautrech made vnto him to ratifie the accord made with the Duke of Ferrara; for he alleaged, that it was a matter very vnworthy, for him to approue in his life time, conditions made in his name whileſt he was dead; but he would not refuſe to contract with him. By reaſon whereof the Duke of Ferrara taking this occaſion, made difficultie (notwithſtanding the King and the Venetians had receiued him into their protection) to ſend to Monſieur Lautrech the hundred men at armes and the money which he had promiſed: as he who doubting the iſſue of affaires, endeuored not to adhere ſo much to the French king, as to leaue himſelf meanes to appeaſe in all euents the mind of the Emperour, to whom he had excuſed himſelfe by his neceſſitie: and he entertained continually at Ferrara, George Fronſpergh and Andrew de Burgo. Yet for all this the armie ceaſſed not to aduance, which vnder the leading of Monſieur Lautrech arriued the tenth day of Februarie vpon the riuer of Tronto, which ſeparateth the Eſtate Eccleſiaſtike from the kingdome of Naples.

But in France when the King had aduertiſement of the retaining of his Embaſſadour, he cauſed the Emperours Embaſſadour to be reſtrained within the Caſtle of Paris, and commanded that all the Merchants ſubiect to the Emperour ſhould be ſtayed through the whole Realme of France. The King of England did the like by the Emperours Embaſſadour reſident with him, whom notwithſtanding he redeliuered, when he vnderſtood that his had not bin retained. And the warre being now publiſhed in France, England and Spaine, the French king vrged, that the warre might be made in Flanders: to giue beginning whereunto, he ſent certaine bands of ſouldiers to make incurſions in that countrey. The Flemings ſtirred not for all that, but onely to defend themſelues; for that the Ladie Margaret of Auſtria labouring to auoide all occaſions to enter warre with the French king, would not ſuffer her people to iſſue out of their countrey. But it was a matter very aduerſe to the King of England to haue warre with the people of Flanders; for that notwithſtanding there were to be conſigned to him as ſoone as they ſhould be conquered, certaine townes promiſed before by the Emperour for aſſurance of the money he had lent him, yet he held it a matter no leſſe preiudiciall, as well for his particular reuenues, as for his Realme, to breake the commerce of his Merchants in that Prouince. Notwithſtanding for that by reaſon of the contract made, he could not openly refuſe it, he deferred it as much as he could, alleaging that according to the capitulations of the obligation, it was lawfull for him to ſtay fortie dayes after the ſummons made, to the end to giue time to the Merchants to retire themſelues: which deſire and cauſe being well knowne to the French king, he ſolicited him to inuade the ſea coaſts of Spaine with an armie by ſea, in ſtead of the warre of Flanders, aſſuring him that he had intelligences in thoſe quarters. Whereupon it happened in the end, that the King of England hauing ſent to the French king the Biſhop of Wincheſter to perſwade him to giue ouer the enterpriſe of beyond the Mounts, and to increaſe and make ſtrong the warre of Italy; by his counſell and perſwaſions there was an order taken, that for the ſpace of eight moneths next enſuing, there ſhould be done no vexation by the French and Engliſh vpon the countries of Flanders, nor any of the Eſtates confining that were ſubiect to the Emperour. And to the end the French king might the more eaſily condeſcend to this couenant, the king of England bound himſelfe to pay thirtie thouſand duckats monethly for the warre of Italy; for the which the contribution promiſed before for ſixe moneths, was determined.

But by how much the preparations of the warre were continually augmented, by ſo much the more were kindled the hatreds betweene the Princes, each of them taking all occaſions to wrong one another, and to contend no leſſe with ſpite and malice, then with armes. For the Emperour about two yeares before, hauing ſpoken in the towne of Grenado, when in like ſort the peace was ſolicited betweene the French king and him, to the Preſident of Grenoble the French Embaſſadour, certaine words which inferred that he would willingly put an end to all quarrels betweene the King and him by ſingle combat of both their perſons, to the end that Chriſtian people and innocent perſons ſhould not ſuffer ſo much; and ſince that time hauing alſo replied to the Herald the laſt time he ſignified the warre to him, the ſame words, adding further; that the French king had dealt with him villanouſly and cowardly in falſifying the faith he had giuen to him: the King when he heard theſe ſpeeches, and ſuppoſing he could not paſſe them ouer in ſilence without ignominie, although the challenge might haply better beſeeme Knights then ſuch Princes as they were; the ſeuen and twentieth day of March he cauſed to be aſſembled in a great hall of his Pallace at Paris, all his Princes, all the Embaſſadours, and all the Court, whither he himſelfe coming afterwards with very great pompe of ſumptuous attire, and braue companie, being ſet in his royall ſeate, he called for the Emperours Embaſſadour who ſued for his diſpatch, for that it was determined that being conueyed to Bayon, he ſhould be deliuered at the ſame time that the Embaſſadours of the Confederates were ſet at libertie; who for that purpoſe were brought to Bayon. The Embaſſadour being come, the King ſpake to him, excuſing himſelfe in that the Emperour had bin principally the cauſe of his reſtraining, for that he had by a new and inhumane example kept retained his Embaſſadour and the Agents of his Confederates: but ſeeing he was now to go to Bayon, to the end they might all be deliuered at one time, he deſired him to carry from him a letter to the Emperour, and to deliuer a meſſage from him, of this tenour: That whereas the Emperour had told his Herald that he had falſified his faith, he had ſaid an vntruth, and that as often as he had ſpoken it, ſo many times he had lied; and that in ſtead of anſwer, to the end not to deferre the triall of their quarrels, that he ſhould aſſigne him the place where they might together performe the combat. And the Embaſſadour refuſing to carry the letter, and to deliuer the meſſage, the King ſaid he would ſend to ſignifie no leſſe to him by an Herald: and that albeit he was not ignorant that he had ſpoken words againſt the honour of his brother the King of England, yet he would ſay nothing of that; for that he knew the King was well able to defend himſelfe: but if through the indiſpoſition of his bodie he had any lawfull impediment, he offered to put his perſon in hazard for him. Not many dayes after the King of England gaue the ſame defiance, with the ſame ſolemnities and ceremonies. But this was a matter not much for the honour of the Princes of Chriſtendome, that hauing among them a warre of ſo great importance, and ſo preiudiciall to all the common wealth of Chriſtendome, they ſhould alſo trouble their minds with ſuch thoughts. And yet in this great heate and furie of warre, the order of our ſtorie draweth into diſcourſe ſome report of the King of England touching the refuſing of the Ladie Katherine of Aragon.

The lie giuen by the French king to the Emperour.

The ſaid King had to wife the ſaid Ladie Katherine daughter to Ferdinand and Elizabeth Kings of Spaine; a Queene certainly worthy of ſuch parents, and for her vertues and prudence was much beloued and reuerenced of the whole eſtate of the Realme: and in the time of the father of that King, had bin firſt maried to Arthur his eldeſt ſonne, but being almoſt no ſooner maried then ſhe became a widow, ſhe was eſtſoones by the conſent of her father and father in law,

For what occaſion the king of England refuſeth his wife the Lady Katherine of Aragon.

law, maried to Henrie the yonger brother, but with diſpenſation of Pope Iulio, in regard of the affinitie that was neare and ſtrait: of which mariage was procreated a ſonne, who died immediatly, and afterwards there ſucceeded no other generation of children then a daughter: the ſame giuing occaſion to many of the Court to murmure, that for the vnlawfulneſſe of the mariage, being not diſpenſable in the firſt degree, they were miraculouſly depriued of iſſue male. This occaſion was aptly taken and managed by the Cardinall of Yorke, who knowing the Kings deſire to haue ſonnes, began to perſwade him, that refuſing his firſt wife, who iuſtly was not his wife, he ſhould marry another: whereunto he was not induced by conſcience, or of a ſimple deſire that the King might haue iſſue male, but by an opinion that he could induce the King to take Reney the daughter of king Lewis, a matter which he extremely deſired, for that knowing he was generally hated of all the Realme, he ſought to prepare remedies againſt all accidents that might happen, both during the life and after the death of the king. And he was hereunto induced alſo by the great hatred he had conceiued againſt the Emperour, for that he ſatisfied not his incredible pride either in demonſtration or with effects: and he doubted not for the great authoritie the king and he had with the Pope, to diſpoſe him to publiſh a iudiciall diuorce. The king hearkned to this counſell, not regarding that end which the Cardinall of Yorke had propounded to himſelf; but being moued (as many haue reported) not ſo much by the deſire to haue a ſon, as for the loue which he bare to a Ladie of the Queenes traine, whom he determined to take to wife, his purpoſe being not knowne either to the Cardinall of Yorke or to any other: the which when it began to be diſcouered or coniectured, the Cardinall of Yorke had no meanes to diſſwade him frō the diuorce: neither ſtood it with his authoritie to counſel him contrary to that which he had perſwaded him before. And now the king hauing demanded the opinions of Diuines, Lawyers, and men religious, many anſwered him that his mariage was not lawfull, either for that they beleeued ſo, or elſe (according to the cuſtome of men) to gratifie their Prince. Therefore when the Pope was deliuered out of priſon, he ſent Embaſſadors vnto him to perſwade him to enter the League, and to labor, according to his direction, the reſtitution of Rauenna, but chiefly to the end to obtaine facultie to proceed in the diuorce; which he ſought not by way of diſpenſation, but by declaration, that the mariage with Katherine was of none effect: and the king perſwaded himſelfe that the Pope, for that he was weake in force and reputation, and hauing no ſtay of the puiſſance of other Princes, and moued alſo with the late benefite of the great fauour receiued of him for his deliuerie, he would eaſily conſent, knowing withall, that the Cardinall of Yorke, who had alwayes fauoured his affaires, and afore him the doings of Pope Leo, was very gracious with him. And to the end the Pope might not alleage excuſes of feare for any offence he might giue the Emperour, being the ſon of the ſiſter of Katherine; and to draw him on with that gift, he offered to wage for his ſafetie a guard of foure thouſand footmen. The Pope hearkned vnto this propoſitiō, and though he conſidered the importance of the matter, and the great infamie that might redound to him thereby, yet being at Oruietta, and in the condition of a Newter betweene the French king and the Emperour, and of litle confidence with either of them, and in that regard eſteeming much to preſerue the amitie of the king of England, he had not the courage to gainſay this demand: but making ſhew that he deſired to ſatisfie the king, and yet holding things in ſuſpence, for the difficultie that he made of the meanes that were propounded, he kindled ſo much the more the hope and importunitie of the King and his Agents: which wel-ſpring of many aduerſities, tooke augmentation and increaſing dayly. But when the Pope had heard Monſieur Vaudemont and Monſieur Longueuille, and anſwered them with generall words, he ſent to the King together with Monſieur Longueuille, the Biſhop of Piſtoya, to ſignifie vnto him, that foraſmuch as he was without money, force and authoritie, his declaration would profit the Confederates nothing: That he might onely helpe to ſolicite a peace, and that to this end he had giuen commiſſion to the Biſhop to go to the Emperour to exhort him thereto with ſharpe words and rigorous; a matter which the King, although he was not much diſcontented for the neutralitie, yet doubting leſt he ſent to negociate ſome further matter, would not conſent vnto: neither did the Emperor complaine of the Pope if he remained Newter.

Lautrech entreth into the realme of Naples: Andrew Dore retireth from Genes.

But now it was determined, that at ſuch time as Monſieur Lautrech marched on, the armies by ſea ſhould do the like; but many difficulties gaue impediment thereto. For the twelue galleys of the Venetians, which before were retired to Liuorne, hauing ſuffered much in the exploit

of Sardigna, both by the rage of the sea, and for want of victuals, they departed the tenth day of Februarie from Liuorne to go to Corfo, to be repaired and renewed: neuertheleſſe the Venetians promiſed to ſend twelue other galleys in their place to ioyne with the French armie by ſea; which alſo had their difficulties, as well for the perplexities they had paſſed, as for the controuerſies happening betweene Andrew Dore and Ranſe de Cere: for the which, albeit Ranſe remained ſicke at Piſa; yet it was ſet downe that Andrew Dore, who with all the galleys was come to the ſhores of Liuorne, ſhould with his fleet of galleys ſet his courſe for the Realme of Naples: and Ranſe with the other French galleys and the foure of Frier Bernardine, together with the ſquare of the Venetians, which were all aſſembled together, ſhould aſſaile Sicile. But Andrew Dore with his eight galleys, and eight other of the French kings, retired to Genes, ſaying it was neceſſarie both for himſelfe and his galleys to take ſome reſt, either for that ſuch was the true cauſe thereof, or for that the intereſts of the affaires of Genes inclined his mind to new enterpriſes. For, the Genowayes hauing demanded of the King that he would ſuffer them to be gouerned abſolutely by themſelues, offering him for that gift of libertie two hundred thouſand duckats, and the King refuſing it; it was beleeued that it was not pleaſing to Andrew Dore, who was either the author, or at leaſt the ſoliciter of theſe demands, that the King ſhould conquer Sicile, if he would not conſent to the libertie of the Genowayes: and there was alſo publiſhed another cauſe of controuerſie, which was of importance. For the King hauing diſmembred the Citie of Sauona from the Genowayes, it was doubted leſt the moſt part of commerce and traffike of merchandizes being transferred in ſhort time to Sauona, in fauour of the King; and for the oportunitie of the ſituation, the kings nauie retiring thither, and ſhips built there for his ſeruice, the Citie of Genes would be depriued of her abundance of inhabitants and plentie of riches: and therefore Andrew Dore vſed all his endeuour to induce the king to reſtore Sauona to the ancient ſubiection of the Genowayes. But farre better ſucceſſe followed the enterpriſes of Monſieur Lautrech, then the expeditions at ſea; for when he was arriued at Aſcoly, he ſent Peter of Nauarre with his footbands to Aquila, Teramo and Iulianoua being rendred to him at the firſt braite of his comming. The Marquis of Saluſſa followed him with his regiments by the way of Leonеſſa: and laſt of all ſucceeded Horacio Baillon with an hundred and fiftie light horſemen, and foure thouſand footmen of the black bands of the Florentines. The Venetians had alſo promiſed to ſend vnto him without the perſon of the Duke of Vrbin, foure hundred light horſemen and foure thouſand footmen, of thoſe bands which they had in the territorie of the Church: and in ſupply of the others which they were bound to adminiſter to the warres of Naples, they had accorded to pay three and twentie thouſand duckats for euery moneth: and they aſſured that in regard of the nauie at ſea, they would aduance ſixe and thirtie veſſels, to giue aide to the enterpriſe of Sicile. Neuertheleſſe it appeared manifeſtly that they were wearie, for that they proceeded very ſlowly in the expences, the French king alſo doing the like: ſeeing that at the ſame time newes came to Monſieur Lautrech that the aſſignation for an hundred and thirtie thouſand crownes a moneth for the charges of the warre, which the king had made to him at his departure out of France (of which there was yet about two hundred thouſand to receiue) was reduced onely to threeſcore thouſand crownes the moneth, and that but for three moneths to come; which brought him into great deſpaire, complaining that the king was moued neither with reaſon, nor his faith, nor the memorie and example of his owne domage: for he ſaid, that foraſmuch as the king had conuerted to the enterpriſe of Fontarabi his treaſures and forces which ought to haue ſerued him for the defence of the Duchie of Millan, it had bin the cauſe to make him loſe that Eſtate. The enterpriſe of Aquila ſucceeded happily, for that Peter of Nauarre being approched neare vnto it, the Prince of Melfe went out of it, and there entred for the French king the Biſhop of the towne, ſonne of the Count Montoire. In like ſort the Lanceknights of the Venetians tooke by compoſition Ciuitella, which was a ſmall but ſtrong towne, ſituate ſeuen miles beyond Tronto: which happened by the preuention of two hundred Spaniſh harquebuziers who were ſent for the defence of it. All Abruzza followed the example of Aquila, and the whole reſidue of the Realme of Naples had ſoone done the like, had not the Imperiall armie iſſued out of Rome; which armie after many difficulties and tumults ariſing, for that the ſouldiers would be payed for the time that had paſſed ſince the deliuery of the Pope, departed from Rome the ſeuenteenth day of Februarie; a day which had bene moſt ioyfull and of ſpeciall reſpiration to the long miſeries of the people of Rome, if preſently after their departure the Abbot of Farfa and others of the Vrsins had not entred with the paisants of their dominions, who did very great domages there for many dayes together. Rome was spoyled by the armie not onely of a great part of her inhabitants, with the desolation and ruine of many houses, but also depriued of statues, pillars, excellent stones, and of many ornaments of antiquitie: and yet the Lanceknights refusing to depart without money for two payes, (for the Spaniards consented to be gone without any more money,) the Pope, who desired to cleare the towne of such people, was constrained to giue them twentie thousand duckats, which he payed vnder colour to deliuer the two Cardinals that were hostages: and afterwards they receiued twentie thousand more in the name of the people of Rome, doubting that this pay was also made by the Pope, but vnder that name, to the end to giue the lesse occasion of complaint to Monsieur Lautrech, who notwithstanding complained much, that the Pope with that money had bene the cause that the Imperiall armie went out of Rome, by reason whereof the victorie, which before was manifest and certaine, was now reduced to the doubtfull euents of warre. There issued out of Rome (as the report went) fifteene hundred horse, foure thousand Spanish footmen, two or three thousand Italians, & fiue thousand Lanceknights: so much had the plague diminished their number.

Peter of Nauarre taketh Aquila.

The Imperiall armie iſſueth out of Rome.

The remouing of the Imperiall armie out of Rome constrained Monsieur Lautrech, who otherwise had gone to Naples by the neerest way, to fetch a circuite more long by Pomilla, along the sea coast, for the difficultie to draw the artilleries if in those mountainous places he should haue found any impediment of enemies, and much more to make prouision of victuals, to the end he might not want if haply he were driuen to stay the course of the victorie before the walls of Naples. Therefore he went to Ciuita di Chieta the capitall towne of the hithermost Abruzza, (for the riuer of Pescaire makes separation of the hithermost Abruzza from the furthermost) where Sermona with many other townes of the country rendred vnto him, & in that inclination, either for the affection they bare to the French name, or for hatred to the Spaniards, there was almost no towne which sent not out at least fiue and twentie or thirtie miles before, to yeeld themselues. And yet, because he would passe with the greater suretie and stabilitie, he aduanced not with such diligence as he might haue done: and it was beleeued, to the end to gather in safetie, during the moneth of March, the reuenue of the tribute of Pomilla amounting to foure-scare thousand duckats, which was leuied in fiue townes, that he would send thither Peter of Nauarre with his regiments, for whose frowardnesse (which Monsieur Lautrech was compelled to endure) there was litle good order in the armie. But being departed from Guast, and vnderstanding that part of the enemies armie, to whom the Prince of Melfe was ioyned with a thousand of those Lanceknights which the Viceroy Don Charles had brought out of Spaine, and two thousand Italian footmen come out of Aquila, was arriued at Nocera, which is 40. miles frō Termini, drawing towards the sea; and another part at Campo Basso, which is thirtie miles from Termini, vpon the ordinary way to Naples; when he had sent Peter of Nauarre before with his regiments of footmen, he went the last day of Februarie to Serrata, which is twelue miles from Termini, from whence the fourth day of March he arriued at Saint Seuero. But Peter of Nauarre passing further, entred one day into Nocera, and the other into Foggia, making his entrie at one gate when the Spaniards who were retired to Troya, Barletta and Manfredonia, would haue entred by the other: and this conquest serued greatly for the reuictualling of the armie.

The contents of Monsieur Lautreches armie.

There was in all with Monsieur Lautrech foure hundred lances, and twelue thousand footmen, which were men not very well trained for the warre: but there were to ioyne with him, the Marquis of Saluſſa who marched before all the residue, the regiments of the Venetians, and the black bands of the Florentines, whom Monsieur Lautrech desired much: for that hauing the name to be a band of footmen as apt and resolute for assaults as any infanterie that then was in Italy, they serued as spurres and prouocations to his armie, wherein were men strong and able for the fight. But when he vnderstood by the report of Peter of Nauarre, whom he had sent to view the situation, ỳ there were within Troya and the confines thereof fiue thousand Almaines, fiue thousand Spaniards, and fifteene hundred Italians; and when for the bitternesse of the cold, it was not possible to keep the field, Monsieur Lautrech went the eight day of March to Nocera with all the footmen and light horsmen, and the Marquis of Saluſſa being newly arriued, put into Foggia with the men at armes and a thousand footmen: and Monsieur Lautrech gaue out, that he would giue battell if occasion were offered, as well for other reasons, as for that the assignations which the King had giuen to him, being diminished, he could not long sustaine the expences of the

warre: and he left within Saint Seuero with a ſlender guard all the Embaſſadours and other people that were not apt for the warre; for ſo he ſeemed to be there in ſuretie, without any neceſſitie to giue battell, vnleſſe with aduantage, neither had he want of victuals, though he lacked grinding. Afterwards he iſſued out the twelfth day of March, and tooke the field three miles beyond Nocera, and within fiue miles of Troya: for Nocera and Barletta which are diſtant one from another twelue miles, are not paſt eight miles from Troya. Touching the Imperials, who had aſſembled together almoſt all the companies that were within Manfredonia and Barletta, and had plentie of victuals within Troya, they iſſued out to skirmiſh, though all the bands of footmen except the Lanceknights were not payed; and the day following, they tooke the field without artilleries, in a ſtrong place vpon the hill of Troya: but Monſieur Lautrech the fourteenth day enuironed y hill on the vpper part that looketh toward the South drawing towards the mountaine; and turning his face to Troya, he began to aſcend, and when he had wonne the hill in a hote skirmiſh, he incamped in a place that commanded them, and compelled them with his artilleries to retire ſome into Troya, and ſome behind Troya, making himſelfe maiſter of their tents: ſo that both Troya and the Imperiall armie remained betweene the French armie and Saint Seuero; which made it vneaſie for them to haue any ſuccours from Naples, and alſo ſtopped for the moſt part the victuals that might be brought to them, notwithſtanding they conſumed not much, as being diſcharged of the baggage and vnneceſſarie people: and on the other ſide, the traffike of victuals that paſſed from Saint Seuero to the French campe, was ſtopped by them, and alſo they held Saint Seuero in feare, which they might aſſault with part of their people, and not be perceiued by the French.

The armies lying incamped in this ſort, that is to ſay, the French men beyond Troya towards the mountaine, and the Imperials on this ſide towards Nocera aboue the towne, vpon a pendent very wel fortified, and the moſt part of the places thereabouts being commanded by the French, they remained in that order vntill the nineteenth day, all the nights being ſpent in alarmes, and the dayes running out in skirmiſhes, in one of which was taken priſoner Martio Colonno: and the Imperials oftentimes gaue impediment to the victuals that went from Saint Seuero and Foggia to the French army, which for that impediment felt ſome incommoditie, hauing need of a ſtrong conuoy to defend them. At this time the Imperiall Captaines conſulting among themſelues what was to be done, the Marquis of Guaſt perſwaded to offer battell, ſeeing the French armie increaſed and theirs diminiſhed. But the counſell of Captaine Alarcon caried more authoritie, who ſaid there was more hope of the victorie in ſtanding vpon their defence, and letting time runne, then by referring themſelues to the arbitration of fortune. The nineteenth day the Imperials retired into Troya, for that they were much endomaged by the artilleries of the enemies: but afterwards hauing rampiered their campe againſt the furie of the ſhot, they repaired thither againe in good ſeaſon, and returned in euill time within Troya. But the one and twentieth day at the appearing of the morning they brake vp, and went towards the mountaine to Ariano, making a great dayes march. They found into Troya a great quantitie of victuals, farre ſurmounting that which the French men beleeued before, by reaſon whereof hauing ſtopped all paſſages by the which victuals might be brought them, they promiſed themſelues the victorie. It was beleeued that they brake vp, either to draw the French into a place where they might find want of victuals, or for that they had intelligence that the day following they expected the blacke bands in their campe, who as they came on, being lodged in Aquila, had leudly ſacked that Citie, no man offering them any wrong, nor being any way prouoked, but onely for a deſire to make pillage. The two and twentieth day Monſieur Lautrech incamped at Lioneſſa vpon the riuer of Ophanto, which the Latins call Aufidum, ſixe miles from Aſcoli, hauing ſent the blacke bands and Peter of Nauarre with his regiments and two cannons to take Melfe: where when they had made a ſmall breach, the Gaſcons preſented themſelues to the wall, and the blacke bands with more furie, againſt the direction of their Captaines, did the like: but the harquebuziers beating them in flanke, they were repulſed with the death of many Gaſcons, and about threeſcore of the blacke bands: and the ſame euening in another aſſault which they gaue, after the batterie had continued, they were handled almoſt in the ſame maner. But in the night there came to the campe a ſupply of artilleries ſent by Monſieur Lautrech, with the which hauing made two great batteries the next morning, the paiſants within Melfe, whereof there was a great number, began in their feare to draw into tumult: for feare of which tumult the ſouldiers who were about fixe hundred, being much troubled, abandoned the defence: in so much as those of the campe entring the towne, they slue all the paisants and the men of the towne: but the souldiors retired into the Castle with the Prince, and yeelded soone after, as was said by those of the campe, to discretion, notwithstanding they pretended that their liues were excepted. The Prince was saued with a very few of his souldiers, and all the residue put to the sword, and the towne sacked, wherein there were slaine in all three thousand bodies; where there was found great store of victuals, to the great commoditie of the French men, who, by reason of their hard prouision, had great want in Powilla of that whereof there was great plentie in this place. The foure and twentieth day the Spaniards departed from Ariano, and incamped at Tripalda, which is fiue and twentie miles from Naples vpon the high way, and fortie miles from Ofanto; with whom ioyned the Viceroy, the Prince of Salerne, and Fabricio Maramus with three thousand footmen and twelue peeces of artilleries: and it was said that Captaine Alarcon issued out of Naples with two thousand footmen to defend the Tribute. Neuertheless Monsieur Lautrech stayed vpon the territories of Ofanto to make first great prouision of victuals, and al his cõpanies were incamped betweene Ascoly and Melfe: and after the accident of Melfe, were rendred Barletta, Trany, and all the townes thereabouts except Manfredonia, wherein was a thousand footmen: and hauing sent Peter of Nauarre with foure thousand footmen to take the Rocke of Venosa, which was guarded by two hundred and fiftie Spanish footmen, who defended it valiantly, he had it at discretion, and retaining the Captaines prisoners, he sent away the others without weapons: hauing set downe such order, that the reuenue of the Tribute of Powilla should be receiued for him; the which for the impediments which the warre brought, arose not to halfe so much as was wont to be gathered. In this place the Commissarie Pisano with the Venetian regiments containing about two thousand footmen, came to Monsieur Lautrech, who was still busied to prouide that he might be assured of victuals and prouisions; which was also made more easie to him, when he had got into his power Ascoly by the meanes of the Venetian regiments. At which time taking courage by the happie euent of his affaires, he vrged the Pope with haughtie words to declare himselfe for the League: who, notwithstanding those of Viterba would not at first before receiue his Gouernour (whereof Octauian Spirito was the cause,) yet afterwards yeelding for feare, he transported the Court to Viterba: and Vespasian Colonno being dead at the same time, who ordained by his testament that Isabel his onely daughter should be maried to Hippolito de Medicis, the Pope got possession of all those places which he held in the territories of Rome, notwithstanding Ascanio pretended that they appertained to him by the ceassing of the line masculine of Prosper Colonno. About this time Monopoly was rendred to the Venetians, for whom, according to the last couenants made with the French king, were gotten all those ports of the Realme of Naples which they possessed before they were ouerthrowne by king Lewis the twelfth in Guiaradadda.

These prosperities of the French, induced the Duke of Ferrara to send his sonne into France to accomplish the mariage; which he had before industriously deferred, refusing euen to be Captaine of the League. But the Emperour who sent no men out of Spaine to relieue the great dangers of the kingdome of Naples (for that he sent from thence onely fixe hundred footmen into Sicile, and those not very seruiceable) had giuen order that the Duke of Brunswich should passe out of Germanie into Italy with new supplies of Lanceknights for the succour of that kingdome; who were prepared with so much the more care, by how much they vnderstood the necessitie to rescue it was great, by reason of the proceedings of M. Lautrech. But to the end the aduancing of those supplies should not trouble the hope of the victorie, it was agreed by the consent of the King of England, the French king, and the Venetians, that the Lord Francis of Saint Pol, descended of the house of Bourbon, should passe into Italy with foure hundred lances, fiue hundred light horsemen, fiue thousand footmen French, two thousand Swissers, and two thousand Lanceknights, to the end to follow them if they went to the Realme of Naples, but otherwise to make warre in the Duchie of Millan together with the regiments of the Venetians and of Francis Sforce: and the King of England was to contribute thirtie thousand duckats a moneth towards the expences of this armie, for the entertainment whereof threescore thousand duckats were to be payed for euery moneth; & the Venetians had resolued in the Councel of the Pregati, to wage ten thousand footmen. At this time the inhabitants of Millan were reduced to an extreme & miserable subiection by the intollerable exactions imposed vpon them by Anthony Monsieur S. Pol appointed to the warres of Italy.

The miserable condition of the citie of Millan.

de Leua, who the better to prouide for the payes of his ſouldiers, had drawne into his owne hands all the victuals of the Citie, and hauing beſtowed them in publike ſtore-houſes and garners, and ſelling them in his owne name, he ſet them at what price he thought good; the inhabitants being conſtrained to buy them, vnleſſe they would die for hunger: and many poore people which had no meanes to buy them, died in the ſtreets. And yet the money that he got by this means, not ſufficing to pay the Lanceknights that were lodged in the houſes, they daily ranſomed their hoſts, and kept ſuch in chaines as would giue them no money: and becauſe many to auoide this crueltie and intollerable charges were fled and did continually flie out of the Citie notwithſtanding the rigor of the commandements and diligence of the warders, they confiſked the goods of ſuch as were abſent, who were ſo many in number, that to auoide the labour to ſet them downe in writing, they cauſed them to be put in print: and the Nobles that remained there, were ſimply apparelled, and very poore: and thoſe places of the Citie that were wont to be moſt frequented, full of nettles and brambles: and yet all things ſucceeded happily to him that was the author of all theſe cruelties. For Captaine Mus being incamped at Lecquo with ſixe hundred footmen as ſouldier of the League, and hauing taken away the barkes to the end the Spaniards that were within Coma might not ſuccour it by the Lake, Anthonie de Leua hauing ſent for the bands of footmen that were within Nouaro, iſſued out of Millan, and incamped fifteene miles off with the Lanceknights: and after he had taken the Rocke of Olgina ſtanding vpon the ſhores of Adda, which Captaine Mus had taken before, he ſent Philip Torniello with the bands of footmen Spaniſh and Italians, to giue ſuccours to Lecquo which is vpon the other ſhore of the Lake, where Captaine Mus with the aide of the ſouldiers whom he had drawne from the Venetians and the Duke of Millan, and with the artilleries which he had gotten from the Venetians, had taken, and fortified all the paſſages, of themſelues very difficult for the roughnes of the wayes and ſteepneſſe of the mountaines. But the Imperials who tooke the mountaine oppoſite that commandeth Lecquo, after they had in vaine attempted to paſſe in many places, at laſt they forced that place where the Venetian ſouldiers guarded; whom the Captaine, either for that he had litle confidence in their vertue, or at leaſt to beſtow them where was leaſt danger, had put in places moſt ſteepe and inacceſſible. Then Captaine Mus with his ſouldiers and artilleries, being mounted vpon the barkes, ſaued himſelfe, not without ſuſpition that the Venetians had made a light defence to gratifie the Duke of Millan, to whom it was not pleaſing that he ſhould take Lecquo: and ſoone after, to the end to carry by accord that which he could not win by armes, turning to the ſeruice of the Imperials, he obtained of Anthonie de Leua by way of accord, both Lecquo and many other places: and obtained alſo of Ierome Moron, who by letters had bin the author of this practiſe, ceſſion of his rights. By reaſon of this accord Anthonie de Leua who before had bene much afflicted by hunger, was much relieued both with victuals and money. For the Captaine, who aſpiring to greater things, tooke vpon him afterwards the title of Marquis, payed thirtie thouſand duckats, and ſent into Millan three thouſand ſackes of corne.

Monſieur Lautrech in this meane while marched towards Naples, and by the third day of Aprill was come to the Rocke Manarda, hauing left for the guard of Powilla (where onely Manfredonia held for the Emperour) fiftie men at armes, two hundred light horſemen, and fifteene hundred or two thouſand footmen, all bands of the Venetians. But the Imperiall armie who had reſolued, abandoning all the plaine countrey, to looke to the defence of Naples and Caietta, after they had ſacked Nola, to cut off victuals from the enemies, and caried to Naples all the victuals that were within Capua, they incamped vpon the hill of Saint Martin, and the day following entred into Naples with ten thouſand footmen as well Spaniſh as Lanceknights, hauing diſmiſſed the Italian bands (except ſixe hundred who were vnder Fabricio Maramus) for that Sarra Colonno was gone to Abruzza with his bands of footmen. There remained in Naples very few of the inhabitants, for that almoſt all men of qualitie, and ſuch as had any meanes, were retired into Iſchia, Capri, and other Ilands confining. It was ſuppoſed that there was corne enough for more then two moneths, but of fleſh and other victuals a ſmall quantitie. Capua, Nola, Acerra, Auerſa, and all the places thereabout yeelded to Monſieur Lautrech, who remained foure dayes with his armie in the Abbey of Acerra which is ſeuen miles from Naples: and he had marched & did march ſlowly, to tarry for the victuals, which could not follow, becauſe of the foule wayes and raines, which had made all the countrey full of waters. Beſides, it behoued him to make great proprouiſions of victuals, for that the bruite ranne, that in his armie (according to the corruption of the diſcipline of warre at this day) there were more then twentie thouſand horſes and foure-ſcore thouſand men, of whom two third parts were vnprofitable for ſeruice. From this place he ſent to the enterpriſe of Calabria, Simon Roman with an hundred & fiftie light horſemen, and fiue hundred Corſikans not payed, but were come from the campe of the Imperials. And now Philippin Dore, who with eight galleys of Andrew Dore, and two ſhips was come into the roade of Naples, had taken a ſhip laden with graine and with his artilleries, compelled the Imperials to diſlodge from Magdelaine: and although ſhortly after he tooke two other ſhips laden with graine, and brought vpon the enemies many other diſcommodities, yet his galleys onely ſufficed not to hold the port of Naples wholy beſieged. By reaſon whereof Monſieur Lautrech ſolicited that the ſixteene galleys of the Venetians might be ioyned with the fleete of Philippin: the which when they were repaired by leyſure at Corfu, were come to the port of Trany, although the Cities of Trany and Monopoly were already rendred vnto them, yet preferring their particular profite before the intereſts of others, (notwithſtanding all theſe things depended on the victory of Naples) they ſtayed, to the end to take alſo Pulignano, Ottronto, and Brunduſium. The ſeuenteenth day of April Monſieur Lautrech incamped at Cauiano, within fiue miles of Naples; and the ſame day the Imperials who had many light horſemen (their care & diligence being far greater then the negligence of the French men) tooke from the French a great quantitie of victuals, whereof they were ill prouided: and had alſo fortified Saint Hermo, which is on the top of the mount Saint Martin, to the end to take from the French men (for that it commands the towne of Naples) all commoditie to vexe it with their artilleries: and for that being maiſters of that mountaine, they might hinder the French for approching the moſt parts of the Citie. The French men tooke ſome hope by the diſcords that were among the enemies, of whom the Marquis of Guaſt for ſome particular quarrell, hurt the Count Potenſa and ſlue his ſonne. But the one and twentieth day the French armie came to Caſoria, within three miles of Naples vpon the way of Auerſa, on which day they skirmiſhed vnder the wals of Naples, where was ſlain Migliau, he who had impugned with all his induſtrie the deliuerie of the Pope, for the which he himſelfe had brought to the Captaines the Emperours Commiſſion. The two and twentieth day the armie incamped within a mile and an halfe of Naples, where Monſieur Lautrech forbad his ſoldiers to skirmiſh, as a matter vnprofitable: there was Pozzuolo rendred to him. Finally, the laſt day but one of Aprill the armie being arriued neare the Citie of Naples, incamped betweene Poggio Royall, which is a ſtately houſe of pleaſure, and builded by Alphonſo of Aragon the ſecond, when he was Duke of Calabria, and the hill of Saint Martin. The companies extended euen within halfe a mile of Naples, and the perſon of Monſieur Lautrech lay ſomewhat beyond Poggio Royal at the farme houſe of the Duke of Monte Alto, in which place he had fortified himſelfe, enlarging his campe towards the way of Capua. It was a place of very good ſituation, and aptly ſeruing to cut off from them of Naples the commoditie of water pipes that come from Poggio Royal: and he made his reckoning to plant another lodging ſomewhat before that, aboue the hill that is beneath the mount Saint Hermo, to the end to cut off more commodities from thoſe of Naples, and to vexe the towne more nearely: of which things to haue the more perfect information, it ſeemeth neceſſarie to deſcribe the ſituation of the Citie of Naples, and the countrey about it.

MOnſieur Lautrech being lodged with his armie neare the wals of Naples, the firſt thing he drew into conſultation was, whether it were beſt to attempt the expugnation of that towne with the furie of artilleries and the valour of men, as many aduiſed him, who were of opinion that for the performance hereof the numbers of footmen ſhould be increaſed. Theſe men alleaged many difficulties, in regard whereof there could be no hope to remaine long before the towne: to wit, the difficultie of victuals, for that the enemies who had a great number of light horſemen, were ready to giue impediments: the hope being vncertaine that Naples would render for famine, for that the galleys of Philippin Dore being not ſufficient to hold the port reſtrained, and thoſe of the Venetians not arriuing, notwithſtanding they were dayly promiſed, there came from Caietta to Naples where there was want of grinding, foure galleys laden with meale, and other veſſels entred the towne dayly: the cold prouiſions of the Venetians, who of the two and twentie thouſand duckats which they were to pay monethly to Monſieur Lautrech, were already behind with him for threeſcore thouſand: the ſlender reliefe of money that came out of France: and the maladies and diſeaſes that generally reigned in the armie, which notwithſtanding proceeded not ſo much by the ordinarie thickneſſe of that aire, which by cuſtome beginneth to be dangerous in the end of Sommer, as through the great quantities of raines that fell, and withall many of the ſouldiers lay in the open fields. Neuertheleſſe Monſieur Lautrech conſidering that in ſo great a multitude and vertue of defendants, and for the fortification of the mount Saint Martin, which might be ſuccored, it was a hard matter to take either the hill or the towne; and haply being vnwilling to expend his money with ſmall hopes, fearing to want it for the furniſhing of ordinarie expences, he determined not to aſſault the towne, but to beſiege it: hoping that in a ſhort time the enemies would fall into the want of victuals or money. Therefore he turned his mind and all his prouiſions to the beſieging of Naples, hauing ſpeciall regard to cut off all acceſſe of victuals by land, and ſoliciting the coming of the Venetian galleys, to depriue them of all reliefe by ſea: and yet altering his reſolution, he gaue libertie to skirmiſh, leſt the ſouldiers remaining idle ſhould loſe courage: in ſo much as there were many skirmiſhes, to the great commendation of the blacke bands, who being moſt reſolute & ready in that kind of fighting by the diſcipline of Iohn de Medicis, had not as yet made any ſhew of their valour in the plaine field in any battel pitched and ranged, where they were to keepe their ground. At this time came to the armie foureſcore men at armes of the Marquis of Mantua, and an hundred from the Duke of Ferrara, who notwithſtanding he had bene amply receiued into the protection of the French king and the Venetians, yet had deferred as long as he could to ſend them, to order his deliberations according to that which might be coniectured of the euent of the warre.

In this eſtate of affaires the Imperials gathered ſome hope to be able to ouerthrow Philippin Dore, who was with his galleys in the gulfe of Salerne: in which enterpriſe they repoſed not not so much confidence in the number and goodnesse of their vessels, as in the valour of their souldiers. For they furnished sixe Galleys, foure Foists, and two Brigantines, with a thousand harquebuziers Spanish, of the most valiant and best choise of the armie: with whom entred Don Hugo Viceroy, and almost all the Captaines and personages of authoritie. To this armie by sea, governed by the counsell of Gobbo, a skilfull and famous Captaine for sea service, were adioyned many barkes of fishermen, to astonish the enemies a farre off, through the appearance of a greater number of vessels: which fleete being all departed from Posilipo, arriued in the Ile of Capri, where Don Hugo to the great preiudice of that exploit, lost time to heare a Spanish Hermit, who preaching vnto them, inflamed them to fight according to the glorie of that nation gotten in so many victories. From thence, leauing on the left hand the Cape of Minerua, they entred into the maine sea, and sent before two Galleys with this direction, that when they approched the enemies, they should make shew as though they would flie, to the end to draw them into the maine sea to fight. But Philippin Dore being aduertised the day before by very faithfull and assured espials of the intention of the enemies, had with diligence intreated Monsieur Lautrech to send to him forthwith three hundred harquebuziers, who being commanded by Captaine Croch, were arriued a litle before the Nauie of the enemies was discouered. Which being discerned a farre off, although Philippin had before with great courage aduanced all necessary prouisions to fight, yet being moued with the great number of vessels that were discouered, he stood long in suspence: but he was speedily deliuered of that doubt, when at the approch of the enemies, he discerned that there were not aboue sixe vessels of helme. Therefore with a resolute courage, and as a Captaine well experienced in sea fight, he caused three other Galleys of his to enlarge and cast off, as though they would flie, to the end that in fetching a compasse, they might with a good wind assaile the enemies both in side and in poupe: and touching himselfe, he went with fiue galleys to meet the enemies, who had determined to discharge their artilleries, to take from him by the thicknes of the smoke, both his leuell and view: but Philippin gaue fire to a very great Basiliske of his gally, which pierced through the gally Admirall of the enemie, wherein was Don Hugo, and at the first shoote killed fortie men, of whom was the Captaine of the galley, and many officers: then he discharged the other peeces, which slue and hurt many of them. And on the other side, the artillerie that was discharged from the galley of Don Hugo, slue the Captaine, and hurt the Patron of the galley of Philippin: and when they were approched, there began with the small shot and other weapons, a furious assault: but the Genowayes who were experienced in such encounters, auoided the perill better, fighting low, and standing vpon their guards within the bodie of the pauishes or couerts. Now as these two galleys fought together with wonderfull furie and astonishment, three other galleys of the Imperials closed with two of the Genowayes, and were already far their superiours: but when the three first galleys of Genes that made as though they fled, were got into the main sea, returning vpon the enemies, they played in flank vpon the galley Admiral; & of the three, that which was called the Neptune, brake her maine yard, which did her great domage. There, Don Hugo who was hurt in his arme, whilest he was labouring to encourage his souldiers, being ouerwhelmed with stones and wildfires which were throwne from the tops of the enemies galleys, died in fighting: here the Admirall of Philippin and the galley called the Moore rent in peeces the Admirall of Don Hugo; and the other two with their artilleries sunke the galley of Gobbo wherein Fieramosquo died; and in the meane while the other galleys of Philippin had rescued and recouered two galleys of their companie oppressed by the Spaniards, and tooke their Foists: and onely two of the Spanish galleys, who had bene very shrewdly handled, hardly escaped, seeing the victory of their enemies. At which time the Marquis of Guast and Ascanio, their galley being almost drowned and on fire, their oares broken, their souldiers almost all dead, and themselues being hurt, were made prisoners, the shining of their armour, which was gilt, preseruing their liues. In this battell Philippin was much holpen by certaine captiues whom he deliuered, who were for the most part Turkes and Moores, who fought valiantly. Don Hugo being dead was cast into the sea, and Fieramosquo in like sort. The prisoners were the Marquis of Guast, Ascanio Colonno, the Prince of Salerne, Saint Crosse, Camille Colonno, Gobbo, Serenon, with many other Captaines and Gentlemen. There were more then a thousand footmen slaine: and of the Spaniards very few who were not either slaine or hurt. The prisoners with three galleys were sent by Philippin to Andrew Dore; and one of the two galleys that escaped, went soone after to the seruice of the French.

Fight at sea betweene the Imperials and the French.

The death of Don Hugo de Moncada Viceroy of Naples.

This

This victorie gaue to the French men great hope of the ſucceſſe for the whole enterpriſe, and haply more then was neceſſarie, for that it made Monſieur Lautrech ſomewhat more ſlacke in making prouiſions; but it filled the Imperials with much aſtoniſhment, for feare leſt they ſhould fall into great want of victuals, ſeeing they were abſolutely depriued of all commandement by ſea; and by land reſtrained many wayes, ſpecially ſince the loſſe of Pozzuole, from whence there came great ſtore of victuals to Naples; and the towne of Naples was already fallen into great want of meale and fleſh, their ſtore of wine being well waſted: by reaſon whereof, the day after the ouerthrow, they put out of the Citie no ſmall number of vnprofitable mouthes, and taking order for the diſtribution of victuals, they ordered the matter ſo, that the Lanceknights ſhould haue leſſe want then the other ſouldiers. By which actions the hope of Monſieur Lautrech being nouriſhed, was alſo well increaſed by the ſurpriſe made of a Brigantine the ſeuenth day of May, with certaine letters of the Captaines to the Emperour, whereby they ſignified vnto him that the flower of the armie was loſt: that there was no meale in Naples for any longer time then a moneth and a halfe: that they were driuen to grind their meale with the force of their hands: that the Lanceknights began to incline to tumult: that there was no money to furniſh their pay: and that there remained no remedy for his affaires, vnleſſe there came a ſpeedie prouiſion of money, and ſuccours both by ſea and land: whereunto was added, that the plague was begun in Naples, which is very contagious where Lanceknights do frequent, by reaſon they forbeare not to conuerſe with ſuch as are infected, nor to handle any thing that was theirs. On the other ſide, the French armie wanted water, for that from Poggio Royall, euen to the front of the armie, the campe was ſerued onely with ciſternes: the maladies increaſed, and the enemies being farre their ſuperiours in light horſemen, made continuall ſallies, eſpecially by the way that leadeth to Somma, and not onely brought into the towne much fleſh and ſtore of wine, but oftentimes ſeized vpon the victuals that came to the French campe. Many of the Captaines perſwaded Monſieur Lautrech to wage more light horſemen, to oppoſe againſt thoſe of the enemie, which he did not onely refuſe to do, but ſuffered the moſt part of the French horſemen to lie diſperſed within Capua, Auerſa, and Nola; which made the foreſaid enterpriſes eaſie to the enemies: others aduiſed him, for that diſeaſes had diminiſhed the infanterie of the armie, to entertaine ſeuen or eight thouſand footmen, as well for a ſupply thereunto, as to be more ſtrong, according to their deſire in the beginning; which he alſo refuſed, alleaging that he had no money, notwithſtanding he had at that time receiued from France a good ſumme, and had gathered the Tribute of the cattell of Powilla, together with the taxation of the townes which he had taken; and that the Barons of the Realme that were with him, were readie to lend him a large ſumme of money: wherefore it is a worke worth the labour, to conſider what diſorders are bred by the obſtinacie of thoſe that haue the managing of great affaires. Monſieur Lautrech, without doubt the principall Captaine of the Realme of France, who had long experience in matters of warre, and very great authoritie in the armie, and was by nature haughtie and imperious, whileſt he beleeued himſelfe onely, and deſpiſed the counſell of others, whileſt he would not heare others, but eſteemed it a diſhonour vnto him that men ſhould perceiue that he gouerned not alwayes by his owne iudgement, neglecting thoſe prouiſions, which if they had bene made and employed, might haply haue bene the cauſe of the victorie, but being reiected, were the cauſes that the enterpriſe begun with ſo great a hope, fell to extreme ruine. The ſouldiers of the blacke bands who were lodged in the front of the armie, skirmiſhed dayly, and being tranſported with too great courage, they approched ſo neare the walls of Naples, that from thence they receiued hurt by the harquebuziers; and becauſe in their retiring they had not horſemen to back them, they were ſlaine by the horſemen of the enemies: which was the cauſe that knowing what great diſaduantage it was to them to make skirmiſhes without horſemen vnder the wals of Naples, they began to forbeare to skirmiſh ſo often. After the victory by ſea, the towne of Stabia ſtanding vpon the ſea ſide, yeelded to Monſieur Lautrech, but not the Caſtle. In like ſort Saint Germain rendred: and the garriſons that were within Caietta, hauing recouered Fondy and the countrey thereabouts; Monſieur Lautrech ſent thither Don Ferrand of Caietta, ſonne to the Duke of Traetta, and the Prince of Melfe, who had newly contracted with the French men, for that the Imperiall Captaines were careleſſe to deliuer him, ſo that Fondi was eaſily recouered. Moreouer, Simon Renzin aduanced much in Calabria, by the forwardneſſe of the people to acknowledge the name of the French. But theſe things ſufficed not to obtaine the victorie of the warre, which depended wholly either vpon the conqueſt or defence of Naples. By reaſon whereof Monſieur Lautrech applying himſelfe chiefly to the ſiege, and not altogether deſpairing to be able to take the towne by force, ſeeing ſo many of the Spaniſh footmen were loſt in the battell at ſea, he ſolicited the coming of the French and Venetian Nauie, wholly to depriue that Citie of the victuals that might come thither by ſea: and cauſed the campe to remoue, and planted it in front vpon a litle hill more neare to Naples & the Mount Saint Martin: where the blacke bands caſt a trench, not onely to draw from that hill a trench, which extending euen to the ſea ſide, and hauing in the end thereof towards the ſea a baſtillion, cloſed vp the way of Somma; but alſo immediatly after the ſea armies were come, to aſſay to take by force the mount Saint Martin, hauing cut out before another trench betweene the Citie and the Mount, to ſtop them from ſuccouring one another: and then at one and the ſame time to aſſaile Naples by ſea with the galleys, and by land beating into the Towne from the front of their campe, and aſſailing it without with one part of the armie: and with the other part to inuade the Mount, to the end that the enemies being conſtrained to deuide their forces into ſo many ſeuerall places, they might be the more eaſily ouercome in ſome place: and yet they abandoned not Poggio Royal, though the front of the campe were farre off, to the end that if the enemies did recouer it, they ſhould not cut from them the commoditie of waters, but cloſed vp their campe in the taile. To which counſels and deuices well conſidered, were oppoſed many difficulties, for that the trenches containing more then a mile in length, euen to the ſea, could not be caſt with ſpeed, as well for want of pioners, as for the diſeaſes of the ſouldiers: neither came the armies by ſea (as had bin neceſſarie for the beſieging and inuading of the towne,) for that Andrew Dore with his galleys that were at Genes ſtirred not, neither was there any news of the coming of the Nauie prepared at Marſeilles, and the Venetian fleet regarding more particular profit then the common good, or rather, ſmall and accidentall matters, then principall intereſts, were in the expedition of Brunduſium and Ottranta: of the which Ottranta had couenanted to yeeld, if within ſixteene dayes it were not reſcued; and notwithſtanding Brunduſium had receiued the Venetians by accord, yet the Caſtles held ſtill for the Emperour, whereof that which is ſituate vpon the ſea, was ſo ſtrong, that there was ſmall hope to take it; but the other ſtanding within the towne, which is the greater, ſeemed not able to make any long reſiſtance, for that it had loſt two litle Rocks. The twelfth day of May Monſieur Lautrech cauſed the artilleries to be planted vpon the litle hil, to batter a great tower that vexed not a litle the field. They ſhot oftentimes alſo into the towne, but to very ſmall purpoſe, and ſometimes they skirmiſhed at Saint Anthonies. The ſixteenth day the artilleries being planted vpon the top of the mountaine, played vpon certaine turrets betweene Saint Gennaraes gate and the gate of Capua, and kept them from erecting a baſtillion which the defendants had begun. Within Naples the moſt part liued with ſodden corne, many people departing dayly from thence: and the Lanceknights notwithſtanding they ſuffered leſſe then others, proteſted oftentimes, for want of bread, but much more of wine and fleſh, whereof there was great neceſſitie: and yet beſides other meanes, they were often entertained with falſe letters of ſuccours. The nineteenth day they wrought at the new trenches, by meanes whereof planting two cannons vpon the baſtillion as ſoone as it was made, they reuerſed two mils neare to Magdaleine, that were guarded by two enſignes of Lanceknights, againſt whom they neuer addreſſed themſelues, for that they had ſuccours from Naples.

The affaires of the Frenchmen begin to decline.

Hitherto the affaires of the French men proceeded in a happie courſe, but they began to decline, for many cauſes as yet vnknowne. For Philippin Dore, by the ſecret direction (as was known afterwards) of Andrew Dore, was retired with the galleys to lie about Pozzuolo, ſo that within Naples (where were left few other people then ſouldiers) there arriued dayly ſome quantitie of victuals in barkes. And albeit the Venetian Nauie, after they had conquered Ottranta, gaue continuall hope that they would come to Naples, yet they deferred, hoping to get ſpeedily the great Caſtle of Brunduſium. Furthermore, diſeaſes increaſed dayly in the armie; and whereas the blacke bands were wont to be in all actions three thouſand ſtrong, now there were ſo many of them hurt, ſicke and dead, that they hardly amounted to the number of two thouſand. The two and twentieth day the Spaniards aſſailed thoſe without that defended the new trenches, where was continuall labouring, in hope to finiſh them within ſixe or eight dayes: and Horatio Baillon who was there in a dangerous place with very ſmall companie, was ſlaine in fighting: a death

more worthy of a ſimple ſouldier, then a Captaine: and by reaſon of this diſorder the Imperials conceiuing hope of better ſucceſſe, made againe a great ſally, but the whole campe putting themſelues in armes, and the ſouldiers running to the trenches, they retired. Philippin returned in the end to the gulfe of Naples, by reaſon of the great inſtance that was made vnto him: & the ſeuen and twentieth day the trenches that had bene begun, to cloſe vp the way towards Somma, were not as yet finiſhed: and the Spaniards made incurſions daily, and infeſted the wayes, bringing into the Citie a great quantitie of fleſh; whereunto the horſemen of the campe gaue but litle impediment, for that they went rarely to the field: and Monſieur Lautrech beginning to deſire a ſupply of footmen (but not yeelding wholly to the counſell of others) ſolicited that ſixe thouſand footmen might be ſent him out of France by ſea, becauſe that for the want of victuals, and by reaſon of diſeaſes, many departed from the campe: and in ſo many difficulties he began to be the onely man that had hope of the victorie, repoſing himſelfe wholly vpon the famine of that Citie.

In this time things fell out well in Calabria with Simon Roman, who had with him two thouſand footmen, as well Corſikans as people of the countrey: wherein albeit the Prince of Biſignan and one of the ſonnes of Captaine Alarcon had oppoſed againſt him with fifteene hundred footmen of the countrey, yet they hardly withſtood him, inſomuch as the ſonne of Alarcon retired to Tarentum, leauing the Prince in the field: and ſhortly after Simon Roman got Coſenſa by accord; and after that, he tooke in a towne thereby, the Prince of Stiliano, and the Marquis of Laino his ſonne, with two other of his children. But in Pouilla the garriſon that held Manfredonia for the Emperour, ouerran all the countrey without any reſiſtance of the horſemen and footmen of the Venetians, who were gone to the conqueſt of that countrey. Moreouer, in the quarters about Rome, things were not fully appeaſed, for that Sarra Colonno hauing taken Paliano notwithſtanding he was forbidden in the Popes name on the behalfe of the daughter of Veſpaſian, the Abbot of Farfa recouered it, making priſoners Sarra, and Proſper de Gany, though afterwards Sarra made eſcape by the helpe of Lewis Gonzaga. But whileſt about Naples they were trauelled with theſe difficulties and hopes, Anthonie de Leua being aduertiſed that the towne of Pauie was negligently guarded, wherein was Peter Lungena with foure hundred horſemen, and a thouſand footmen Venetians, and Hannibal Piſſinard Captaine of Cremona with three hundred footmen, which he had led thither to maintaine the countrey beyond Po on the Dukes ſide: he went thither one night, when men doubted nothing, and hauing ſcaled the towne with ladders in three places, he tooke it by aſſault before the ſouldiers were aware: and there remained priſoners Peter Lungena, and one of the ſonnes of Ianus Fregoſo. Anthonie de Leua went afterwards to Biagraſſa, and thoſe within rendred vnto him after they had endured a few ſhot of the cannon; and from thence preparing to go to Arona, Federike Boromei compounded with him, binding himſelfe to follow the Emperours faction.

Anthonie de Leua retaketh Pauie.

About this time the Duke of Brundſwike being iſſued out of Trent the tenth day of May, had paſſed the riuer of Adice with an armie of ten thouſand footmen, ſixe hundred horſe well armed, and amongſt them many Gentlemen, which armie being repulſed from Chiuſa, deſcended vpon the countrey of Veroſe: and albeit (for that it was knowne long before that he would come) there was a reſolution ſet downe that Monſieur Saint Pol ſhould go to meete him, yet making no greater ſpeed in this expedition then in others, the Lanceknights were in Italy before Monſieur Saint Pol could be in order to match; who was driuen afterwards to abide many dayes in Aſt, both to reaſſemble his companies, and for the difficultie of victuals, whereof there was a great dearth and ſcarcitie through all Italy, but chiefly in Lombardie. And there was no hope of any more great or readie ſuccours for the generall affaires, then of the Senate of Venice; who though they had aſſured that their army ſhould take the field with twelue thouſand footmen, neuertheleſſe the Duke of Vrbin who was within Verona, diſpoſed himſelfe to no other enterpriſe then to defend the townes of moſt importance of their Eſtate: ſo that the Lanceknights who were deſcended vpon the Lake of Garda, had Peſquiero by accord, and likewiſe Riuolta and Lunata: inſo much as being Lords almoſt of the whole Lake, they drew money from many places, burning ſuch places as had no meanes to buy their ſafetie. Anthoniot Adorno being come to this armie, perſwaded them to march towards Genes, but foraſmuch as they were without money, and had many difficulties, and for a deſire to haue conference with Anthonie de Leua who was iſſued out of Millan to that end, they marched ſlowly along the countrey

The Duke of Brundſwike in Italy for the Emperour.

of Breſſia, whither went to meete them Andrew de Burgos and Captaine George: by whoſe meanes it was feared leſt the Duke of Ferrara, who in ſo great a feare of others made no preparation, entertained with them ſome ſecret practiſe. After this the Lanceknights addreſſed themſelues towards Adda, to ioyne with Anthonie de Leua, who hauing paſſed the riuer of Adda the ninth of Iune, with ſixe thouſand footmen, and ſixteene great peeces of artilleries, and being incamped neare thoſe companies that were within three miles of Bergama, in which Citie, and alſo in Breſſia and Verona, the Duke of Vrbin had diſtributed his bands of ſoldiers; he perſwaded them, for the great deſire he had to reconquer Loda, to endeuour to recouer the Eſtate of Millan, before they paſſed to Naples. So they incamped the twentieth day of May before Loda, out of which iſſued the Duke of Millan, who retiring to Breſſia, left there Iohn Paul his baſtard brother, and with him about three thouſand footmen: and when the artillery had played, which was planted in two ſeuerall places, and had made a great breach, Anthonie de Leua to whom the firſt aſſault appertained, brought his Spaniſh footmen neare the place where the ruine was greateſt. There they fought brauely for the ſpace of three houres, but the conſtancie and valour of the Italian footmen that were within, being nothing inferiour to theirs, they were repulſed, ſo that diſtruſting any more to be able to take it by aſſault, they had no other hope to get it but by famine: for that the haruеſt being not yet come, there was within Loda ſuch want of victuals, that bread being diſtributed to none but ſouldiers, thoſe of the towne muſt of neceſſitie either die for hunger, or iſſue out, to the great perill of their liues. But the plague was now come amongſt the Lanceknights, and the armie withall ſuffering want of victuals, many returned into their countries by the lands of the Swiſſers and Griſons; wherewith the Duke of Brundſwike their Captaine was not much diſpleaſed, for that hauing conceiued great hopes in Germanie by the example of thoſe footmen which George Fronſpergh had brought, he found by proofe the matters of Italy to be farre more difficult then he had imagined: and his money falling ſhort, it was almoſt impoſſible for him to keepe his footmen before Loda, much leſſe to leade them to the kingdome of Naples: neither did Anthonie de Leua relieue him with money, but put him out of all hope of remedie that way, complaining continually of the pouertie of Millan. For when he had loſt the hope to recouer Loda, he deuiſed all the waies he could to giue them occaſion to breake vp and go away, fearing leſt they would ſtay in the Duchie of Millan, and by that meanes he ſhould haue companions in the gouernment, and in the ſpoile: and whileſt they loſt time, he tooke order to threſh out the corne through all the Eſtate of Millan, and to carry their haruеſt to the towne of Millan. At laſt, as they were going the thirteenth day of Iuly to giue a new aſſault to Loda, the Lanceknights fell into mutinie, and a thouſand of them went towards Coma, and the reſidue, who remained in great diſorder, retired the artilleries from before Loda: by reaſon where of fearing leſt they would returne into Germanie, the Marquis of Guaſt whom Andrew Dore ſuffered to go for twelues dayes vpon his faith, came to Millan to perſwade the Duke of Brundſwike not to ſuffer his ſouldiers to returne into Germanie: but they, who could not be reclaimed with words, went all by the way of Coma, except two thouſand that remained with Anthonie de Leua, to whom in thoſe dayes Mortara was rendred: and it was not doubted, if the Lanceknights had continued before Loda a few dayes more, but they had taken the towne for want of victuals. In which expedition many deſired the forwardneſſe of the Duke of Vrbin, to approch and come (whileſt they lay about Loda) to Crema or Piſqueton, or at leaſt to keepe there ſome number of light horſemen to vexe them, although whileſt they were vpon the countrey of Breſſia, he did ſometimes both accoaſt and moleſt them; but neuer comming within three miles of them, and contenting himſelfe to defend the eſtate of the Venetians, he paſſed not the riuer of Oglio. And Monſieur Saint Pol alſo was not much more diligent to aduance, who, notwithſtanding all the reſolutions and promiſes made by the King, to ſend for his part bands of ſouldiers againſt the Lanceknights, arriued not in Piemont vntill ſuch time as the Lanceknights departed; and yet with a farre leſſe number then they were reported to be. Neuertheleſſe the Confederates forbare not for all this to ſolicite the Pope againe to declare himſelfe for them, and that proceeding againſt the Emperour with ſpirituall armes, he would depriue him of the Empire and the Realme of Naples: but when he had excuſed himſelfe, that if he ſhould declare for them, he could no more be a conuenient meanes for peace; and that his declaration would ſtirre vp a greater combuſtion amongſt the Princes of Chriſtendome, without any profit to the Confederates, as well in reſpect of his pouertie as his weakneſſe; and that the

the priuation of the Emperour would set all Germanie in an vproare, for suspition lest he should appropriate to himselfe the authority to elect the Emperour, and lest he would chuse the French king: he shewed the imminent danger of the Lutherans, whose number increased continually: and in the end being no more able to resist, he offered to ioyne with them, if the Venetians would restore to him Ravenna, which condition he propounded as a matter impossible, and offered likewise to be bound not to molest the Estate of Florence. Vpon which occasion the Embassadours of England came to Venice the twentieth day of Iune, to solicite the Senate to render Ravenna, protesting for the Pope to assure the obseruation of his promises: but when they could not obtaine that of the Senate, they were away ill contented. In this time the Pope recouered the Citie of Rimini, which Iohn Sassatello hauing before assayed in vaine to recouer, was at last yeelded vp with reseruation of life and goods. But now his deepe and most secret thoughts, which were before hidden with great art, could no longer be dissembled. For hauing fixed in his mind a desire to restore to his house the greatnesse which anciently it had in Florence, he endeuored, in publishing the contrary, to perswade the Florentines that he had not any such thought, and that he desired no more, but that that Commonweale, according to the examples of other Christian Princes, would acknowledge him for Pope, and that in token particular they would forbeare to persecute such as depended vpon him, or to deface the armes and ornaments proper to his house. With which commissions hauing sent to Florence as his Embassadour, when he was deliuered, a Florentine Prelate, and the Florentines giuing him no audience, he made great instance, euen by the solicitation of the French king, that they would send to him an Embassadour, seeking by taking away their iealousie, and making himselfe familiar with them, to draw them the more easily into his ambushes. But these deuices sorting to no effect, he began to perswade Monsieur Lautrech, that such as gouerned Siena being dependants of the Emperour, it was conuenient for his affaires to place there Fabio Petrucci: but though Monsieur Lautrech tooke this matter well, and found it good, yet in regard of the contradiction of the Florentines, he forbare to put it to effect. And when the Pope saw he could effect nothing by this meanes, he so wrought by secret threatnings, that Pirrhus de Castello, pretending that the inhabitants of Siena had done him wrong, made himselfe Lord of Chiusa with eight hundred footmen, by the helpe of certaine exiles of that towne, to trouble by that meanes the gouernment of Sienna. But the Florentines hauing shewed to the Vicount of Turaine Embassadour of the French king, that the Pope had no other end, then by the opportunitie of Siena to trouble the affaires of Florence, the Embassadour procured of the Pope, that the action of Chiusa should ceasse.

The Popes intention touching Florence

In this meane while the affaires of the kingdome of Naples proceeded diuersly; for that the Count of Burella was passed from Sicile into Calabria with a thousand footmen, and was ioyned with the residue: and on the other side, Simon Romain with the fauour of mines had gotten the Castle of Cosenza at discretion, although a wound which he receiued in his shoulder by the shot of an harquebuze somewhat stayed the course of the victory: and he ioyned afterwards with the Duke of Somma, who with the bands of footmen of the country, held besieged Catanzaro, a very strong towne, but in necessitie of victuals, wherein was the sonne in law of Alarcon with two hundred horse and a thousand footmen: the which being taken, they should remaine maisters of the whole country euen vp to high Calabria: but necessitie constrained them to turne against the companies that had vnited themselues with the succors come frō Sicile, who had now somewhat aduanced. But Simon being abandoned of part of his footmen leuied in the country, was driuen to retire himselfe into the Castle of Cosenza, and his other footbands not without the slaughter of many of them, dispersed themselues, the Corsikans retiring themselues towards the armie, in so much as not onely Calabria remained in danger, but it was feared lest the victors would addresse their forces to Naples. But on the contrary, the affaires of the French men succeeded happily in Abruzza, for that the Bishop Colonno being approched within twelue miles of Aquila to stirre vp Abruzza to commotion, was ouerthrowne and slaine by the Abbot of Farfa, foure hundred footmen being slaine, and about eight hundred taken prisoners. In the confines of Caietta the Spaniards went retiring, because of the arriuall of the Prince of Melfe, and those of Manfredonia, through the small diligence and valour of the Venetian bands, committed many domages. At this time the Pope perseuered in his resolution, to declare himselfe for neither partie: but because he entertained many practises, the French king held him now suspected, and alſo he was not agreeable to the Emperour, though for no other cauſe, yet for that he had ſent as Legate into England the Cardinall Campeius, to debate there the controuerſie delegated to him and the Cardinall of Yorke. For the King of England making inſtance for the publication of the inualiditie of the firſt mariage, the Pope who was very liberall in words with his Agents, for that finding himſelf in litle credit with other Princes, he laboured to keepe himſelf in his protection, made very ſecretly a Bull decretall, by the which he pronounced the mariage to be of no force, and gaue it to the Cardinall Campeius; and charged him, that ſhewing it to the King and the Cardinall of Yorke, he ſhould tell them that he had commiſſion to publiſh it, if in iudgement the knowledge and information of the cauſe ſucceeded not well, to the end they might with more facilitie conſent to haue the cauſe iudicially debated, and endure with better temperance of mind the longneſſe of the iudgement, which he had enioyned the Cardinall Campeius to deferre as long as he could: and not to deliuer the Bull vntill he had receiued new commiſſion from him, but that he ſhould labour to perſwade him (which alſo it is very likely he then purpoſed) that his intention was to deliuer it to him in the end. Of which appointment of the Legate, and delegation of the cauſe, the Emperours Embaſſadours that were at Rome complained not a litle, though with the leſſe authoritie, for the ill termes of the Emperours affaires in the Realme of Naples.

Cardinall Campeius Legate in England.

Now about Naples many difficulties were happened both to the one and to the other partie, but ſuch as in all diſcourſe of reaſon, gaue more hope of the victory on the French ſide, though it was hindred by the vertue and obſtinacie of the enemies. For within Naples the want of victuals increaſed daily, eſpecially of wine and fleſh, nothing coming in any more by ſea, for that the Venetian galleys which had bin ſo long expected, were at laſt arriued the tenth day of Iune in the gulfe of Naples, to the number of two & twentie. And albeit the horſemen y were within Naples iſſued out daily, not towards the armie, but into thoſe quarters where they thought to find victuals, & brought daily ſome prey of fleſh, by meanes wherof the towne was ſomewhat relieued: yet the proviſions brought in in that ſort, were not ſuch, as being deprined of the commoditie of the ſea, might ſuffice to entertaine them long: and beſides, their money began to faile, the plague afflicted them much, and they had much ado to entertaine the Lanceknights, whom they could no longer abuſe with vaine hopes and promiſes; of whom many went dayly by troupes to the French armie, notwithſtanding the authoritie and grace which the Prince of Orange (who by the death of Don Hugo commanded as Viceroy) had with them, was of great force to retaine them: who committed priſoner Captaine Chat a Gaſcon with many of his ſouldiers, being of the remainders of the regiments of the Duke of Bourbon; and afterwards he did the like for ſuſpition to Fabritio Maramus, whom notwithſtanding he ſet at libertie preſently. On the other ſide, diſeaſes increaſed dayly in the French campe, the ſame being the cauſe that Monſieur Lautrech, to the end not to haue ſo great a circuite to guard, would not ſuffer the laſt trenches to be finiſhed, the which alſo could not eaſily be accompliſhed for the impediment of certaine waters. And withall there was want of victuals in the campe, more through the ill order that was vſed, then for any other occaſion. Neuertheleſſe Monſieur Lautrech hoped more in the neceſſities that were within Naples, then he feared his owne difficulties: and for this cauſe perſwading himſelfe he ſhould ſoone obtaine the victory, or elſe for want of money, he forbare to make new leuies of footmen, as all the armie deſired, by reaſon of the great diminution which was found by reaſon of death and diſeaſes, not onely of meane perſons and ſimple ſouldiers, but now alſo euen of perſonages of authoritie, ſeeing there died the fifteenth day the Popes Nuncio, and Lewis Piſano the Venetian Treaſurer. He hoped alſo to allure to the campe either all or the moſt part of thoſe Lanceknights that were within Naples; a practiſe wherein the Marquis of Saluſſa firſt, and himſelfe afterwards had a long time in vaine bene confident. Theſe cauſes then, together with the hope that was giuen him to draw to the armie certaine of the light horſemen that were within Naples, retained him from entertaining of light horſemen, which had bin very neceſſary, of whom if he had waged but foure hundred, they had ſtood him in good ſtead, and the horſemen of the towne had not runne ſo freely: although one day as they returned to Naples with a great prey of cattell, being encountred by the blacke bands, who were the ſinewes and ſtrength of the armie, and without whom they could not haue ſtayed before Naples, the bootie was taken from them, with the loſſe of about threeſcore horſemen, notwithſtanding the Spaniards iſſued out of the towne, but too late, to reſcue them. Monſieur Lautrech hoped that the enemies would ſhortly be conſtrained to depart from Naples, and therefore to depriue them of all meanes to retire to Caietta, he gaue order to guard Capua, and the ſea towne of Vulturno: and to take from them alſo the meanes to retire into Calabria, beſides that he cut off certaine paſſages, he recontinued the working at the trench, many times begun, but left off againe for ſundry accidents, and raiſed it ſo high, that the waters which gaue impediment were now beneath the worke: and withall he purpoſed to fortifie a certaine houſe very neare to Naples, and to guard it with a thouſand footmen, which he would leuie to that end, making vſe alſo of the benefite of the Venetian galleys, which rode right ouer againſt the trench; which ſerued alſo to cauſe victuals to come more eaſily to the armie from the ſea coaſt, and to cut off the paſſage of the enemies if they returned that way with their booties. For, by reaſon of the great ditches and water-courſes at Poggio Royall that had bin cut vp, the way from the campe to the ſea contained a great and dangerous circuite. The Imperials endeuoured to hinder thoſe that wrought at the trench, againſt whom the Pioners being one day iſſued out in great troupes, according to the direction of Petro of Nauarre who ſolicited that worke, made as though they fled, ſo that the Imperials who purſued them, doubting nothing, were drawne into an ambuſh, wherein were hurt and ſlaine more then an hundred of them. Neuertheleſſe the trench was not as yet halfe finiſhed, as well for want of Pioners, as for other cauſes; for that negligence oftentimes hindred the good directions that were giuen, the execution whereof if it had bin continued, many were of opinion (ſeeing thoſe of Naples were reduced to ſuch a ſtrait) that vndoubtedly Monſieur Lautrech had obtained the victory. At the ſame time was offered a faire occaſion and of great conſequence, if the matter had bin as well executed as it was directed. Monſieur Lautrech had intelligence that the ſouldiers of Naples were iſſued out in great troupes by the way of Pedegrotto to boot-hale and forrage: therefore to vanquiſh them, he ſent out the fiue and twentieth of Iune by night, the ſouldiers of the blacke bands, the horſemen of Florence, and three ſcore French lances, with a band of Swiſſers and Lanceknights, towards Belueder and Pedegrotto, to encounter them; and to hinder their retrait he appointed that Captaine Burio with the Gaſcon footmen ſtanding vpon the hill which is aboue the Grot, ſhould deſcend as ſoone as he ſhould heare the alarme, to keepe the enemies from entring the Grot. The beginning of this exploit ſucceeded well, for that the companies of Monſieur Lautrech meeting with the Imperials, they charged them and put them to flight, more then three hundred of them remaining priſoners and ſlaine, beſides an hundred horſes of ſeruice and great ſtore of baggage: and Don Ferdinand of Gonzaga being ſtricken from his horſe as he fought, and made priſoner, was recouered by the fury of the Lanceknights. But Captaine Burio, either through negligence or feare, came not to the place appointed; which if he had done, it was held for certaine, they had bin all ouerthrowne. Monſieur Lautrech had alſo ſent to Caietta ſixe galleys of the Venetians, and two others to the mouth of Garillan, to ſuccour the Prince of Melfe. And becauſe the galleys could not let the Fregots from bringing ſome reliefe into Naples, he put to the ſea certaine ſmall barks to hinder them: and gaue order alſo that the heards of cattell ſhould be driuen fifteene miles compaſſe from Naples, to the end it might not be ſo eaſie for the Imperials to fetch them in.

But a new accident being now diſcouered, whereof long before certaine ſignes had bin diſcloſed, troubled much the affaires of the French: For Andrew Dore determined to leaue the pay of the French king, to whom he was bound till the end of Iune; and by that which might be coniectured, he had an intention many moneths before ſo to do: and hereupon it came to paſſe that he retired to Genes, and would not go vp with his galleys to the Realme of Naples, and that the French king offering to make him Captaine generall of the army by ſea which he prepared at Marſeilles, he refuſed it, alleaging onely that in regard of his age he was no more able to endure ſo great trauell. The originall of this deliberation was afterwards attributed, as well by himſelfe as others, to diuers cauſes. Touching himſelfe, he complained that the French king whom he had ſo faithfully ſerued for the ſpace of fiue yeares, had made Admirall and giuen the charge of the ſea to Monſieur Barbeſieux, a place which though he had refuſed, yet he thought it reaſonable that after his refuſall the King ſhould haue requeſted him againe to take it: That the King had not payed him the twentie thouſand duckats due for the time paſt, without the which he was not able to entertaine his galleys: That he would not ſatisfie his iuſt requeſts, to reſtore to the Genowayes their accuſtomed iuriſdiction of Sauona; yea, that it had bin debated in the Kings Counſell to cut off his head, as one that vſed his authoritie too arrogantly. Others ſaid, that his discontent grew first of the controuersies betweene him and Ranse de Cere in the enterprise of Sardigna, touching the which he was of opinion that the King hearkened more to the reports of Ranse, then to his iustifications: and that he was much offended with the great instance made vnto him by the King to deliuer vp his prisoners, whom he desired much, as a matter of great importance, but especially the Marquis of Guast, and Antonio Colonno, neuertheless with offer to pay him their ransome. These causes and many others were alleaged: but it was beleeued afterwards, that the true and principall cause was, not so much the disdaine, that the French held him not in such reputation as he thought he had deserued, or for some other discontentment, as the desire he had to deliuer Genes, to make himselfe great vnder colour of the liberties of his country, and that when he could not obtaine his desire by any other meanes, he resolued to follow no more the French king, nor to aide him with his galleys to conquer Naples, as is was also beleeued that to hinder the conquest of Sicile, he had propounded the enterprise of Sardigna. So that hauing taken this resolution, he solicited by the meanes of the Marquis of Guast, to put himselfe into the play of the Emperour, notwithstanding the profession of great hatred, which for the memory of the facts of Genes, he had made many yeares against the Spanish nation, and the rough dealing which he had vsed towards them, when any of them fell into his hands. But for that he vsed dissimulation, his purpose was yet vnknowne to the French king, who for that cause had not looked to remedy an euill of so great importance, although he had conceiued some suspition hereof, by reason of the surprise of a gally, which came into Spaine a Spaniard, who was sent thither vnder the colour to ransome certaine prisoners, with whom was found a letter of credence from Andrew Dore to the Emperour, to whom notwithstanding (on his great complaints) it was permitted to continue on his way, without being examined. At last Monsieur Barbisieux being arriued at Sauona with fourteene galleys, Andrew Dore being in feare of him, retired with his galleys to Genes, and afterwards with his prisoners to Lerice; which when the French king vnderstood, knowing the danger, which was now become remediless, he sent vnto him Peter Frances of Nocera, to retaine him in his pay, by whom he offered him to satisfie his desire touching Sauona, to pay in the twentie thousand duckats that were due before, and to giue him twentie thousand more for the ransome of the Prince of Orange whom he had formerly taken, and the King had afterwards set at libertie, at such time as he made peace with the Emperour at Madril: and in case he would deliuer him the prisoners, to pay him their ransome before they came out of his hands; and that if he would not deliuer them, the King would not take it ill. But Andrew Dore gaue no care to these offers, but iustified with complaints his going from the King: in so much as Monsieur Barbisieux was constrained, to the great preiudice of the affaires of Naples, to stay at Sauona: and yet afterwards passing further, he left for the guard of Genes fiue hundred footmen within ten miles of the Citie, for that the plague was very hote within: And for the same cause he put on land thirtie miles from Genes twelue hundred Lanceknights newly arriued, who had receiued their first pay of the French men, but for that the Venetians had not payed the second, according to their bond, Triuulce Gouernour of Genes was driuen to prouide it. Vpon this reuolting of Andrew Dore, the Pope being aduertised that he entertained practise with the Emperour, signified the same to Monsieur Lautrech the one and twentieth day of Iune, whom he required to consent that he might retaine him in his pay, to the end to depriue the Emperour of his seruice, assuring him that Philippin Dore would depart from Naples within ten dayes: for which cause Monsieur Lautrech restored to Philippin, for that he would not incense him, the Secretary Seremon, whom he had alwaies retained with him, to haue knowledge by his meanes of many secret things: and yet for the suspition he had already conceiued of the Pope, he interpreted sinisterly the aduertisement he had sent him. At last Andrew Dore, notwithstanding that Monsieur Barbisieux, in passing further with his Nauie, containing nineteene Galleys, two Foists, and foure Brigantines, wherein was the person of the Prince of Nauarre, had spoken to him; dissembling no more the thing he intended to do, he sent one of his men to the Emperour in the company of the Generall of the gray Friers (who was created Cardinal & went thither frō the Pope) to establish his confederatiō with the Emperour, which was: The libertie of Genes vnder the protection of the Emperour: The subiection of Sauona to the Genowayes: Pardon to himselfe, who had bin so great a persecutor of the Spanish name, entertainment into the seruice of the Emperour with twelue galleys, and 60000 duckats pay by the yeare, with many other very honorable conditions. In regard here-

of,

of Philippin departed the fourth day of Iuly from before Naples with all his Galleys: whose going away was nothing preiudiciall to the French but onely in reputation, for that he had of late not onely made ill guard, but also his Brigantines had sometimes conueyed victuals into Naples by stealth: and besides that he had had conference with some of Naples, he had caried the sonnes of Anthonie de Leua to Caietta, and was a backe for many dayes to the forragers to passe victuals into Naples: but if he had done faithfull seruice, as he did in the beginning, they had receiued great domage. Monsieur Lautrech for this cause solicited so much the more the coming of the French armie, which by the Popes ordinance, was stayed with great indiscretion about the taking of Ciuitauecchia. By reason of the departure of Philippin with his Galleys, the Venetian fleet who had taken the charge of the worke from the sea shore vntill they met with the trenches of Peter of Nauarre, was driuen to giue it ouer, to guard the sea: which to the end to hold it the more shut vp, there were appointed certaine armed Frigots to scoure the coast day and night; and there was greater diligence vsed also by land, in opposing against the Spaniards, who issued daily, but being encountred they fled without fighting: so that Naples was reduced to an extreme necessitie, and the Lanceknights protested to go their way if they were not speedily succoured with money and victuals: by reason whereof Monsieur Lautrech, who had great hope in these things, perswaded himselfe, that by reason of the long practise holden with them, they would daily come to his armie.

But the fifteenth day of Iuly, the Venetian Galleys, except those that were about Caietta, returned into Calabria to furnish themselues of Bisket: and therefore the hauen lying open, many Frigots passed into Naples with victuals of all sorts, except wine; which came well to passe, for that within Naples there was not so much store of corne as would last till the end of Iuly. Furthermore, in the campe, whither the plague was also come, by the infection of such as came out of Naples, the ordinary maladies increased greatly: Monsieur Vaudemont was at the point of death, and Monsieur Lautrech lay sicke: by reason of whose sickenesse, things were in such disorder, that the Imperials who ouerran all the countrey without impediment, tooke away the victuals that came to the army, where there was great want: and yet for all that they leuied not new companies of light horsemen; yea, Valerio Vrsin who was in the pay of the Venetians with an hundred light horsemen, went from the army for that they were not payed, and were in part vnprofitable by reason of diseases: the men at armes of the French were bestowed in garrison in the places thereabout: and the Gascons being dispersed into seuerall places of the countrey, were busie in gathering in of harueſt and seeking bootie. Neuertheleſſe there was some hope in the bands of footmen which were said to come with the army by sea, which army hauing stayed more then twentie dayes after they parted from the port of Liuorne, arriued at last the eighteenth of Iuly, with many Gentlemen, and with money for the army: but there was onely eight hundred footmen, for that the residue that were brought, remained some for the guard of Genes, and some for the enterprise of the Castle of Ciuitauecchia. At whose coming Monsieur Lautrech hauing sent to the sea side bands of souldiers to receiue the money, the Galleys could not come to land because of the swelling of the sea: and therefore the Marquis of Saluſſa returned thither the next day with his Lances, and with a great regiment of Gascons, Swissers, and Lanceknights, accompanied with the blacke bands; but in their returne they were encountred by the Imperials, being issued out of Naples in great troupes, who gaue so furious a charge vpon the French horsemen, that they turned their backs, and in flying they so rushed vpon their footmen that they disordered them: and Don Hugo de Peppoly (succeeding by the death of Horacio Baillon to the gouernment of the Florentine bands) being on foot with fortie harquebuziers a caliuers shot before the esquadron of the blacke bands, became prisoner to the horsemen: and the fury of the Imperials was such, that if the battalion of the blacke bands had not retained them, they had made a great slaughter, for that they fought admirably, and chiefly the horsemen. There were left dead of the French men more then an hundred, and as many taken, amongst whom were many of the Gentlemen of the sea armie that were set on land: and Monsieur de Ciandale nephew to the Marquis of Saluſſa was also taken; neuertheleſſe the money was preserued. The fault of this disorder was layed vpon the French horsemen, being farre inferiour in valour to the enemies; which did not a litle diminish the courage of the footmen of the armie, who knew they could not stand assured of succours by the horsemen. But that which had most endomaged the armie, was the sickenesse of Monsieur Lautrech, who albeit he laboured with the vertue

of his mind to ſuſtaine the weakneſſe of his body, yet could he not prouide for many things that continually declined. For the Imperials by their ſallies did not only make prouiſion of all things they ſtood in need of, except wine, which they could not carry, but oftentimes bereaued the armie of their victuals, taking their baggage and forrage euen before their rampiers, & their horſes as they were led to the watering: in ſo much as beſides the generall diminution of the army by diſeaſes, things neceſſary began to faile in the campe, which was almoſt reduced of an armie beſieging, to a campe beſieged, and in danger if the paſſages had not bin guarded, to haue ſeene their footmen runne away. Andon the contrary, within Naples commoditie and hope increaſing, the Lanceknights mutined no more, and the reſidue gloried much in that they had ſuffered. By theſe ſo manifeſt dangers, the obſtinacie of Monſieur Lautrech being at laſt vanquiſhed, who not many dayes before had ſent into France to be ſupplied with ſixe thouſand footmen by ſea, he ſent Ranſe de Cere, who was come with the army by ſea, towards Aquila, to leuie foure thouſand footmen and ſixe hundred horſemen, giuing him aſſignation for money to the Treaſurer of Aquila and Abruzza: and Ranſe promiſed to bring them to the campe within a few dayes; which prouiſion would haue ſerued to good purpoſe, if they had bin prepared before. The nine and twentieth day the enemies kept the field, and ſo beſet the wayes, that there was no ſafe paſſage, euen to Capua, which was at the backe of the army, wherein they were almoſt all ſicke. Monſieur Lautrech who ſomewhat before had bin eaſed of his feauer, was fallen into it againe with more danger then before: the men at armes were almoſt all diſperſed in the villages, either becauſe of ſickneſſe, or to refreſh themſelues vnder that excuſe: and the footmen were reduced almoſt to nothing. And within the towne of Naples the plague and other diſeaſes being diminiſhed, by reaſon whereof they were reduced to ſeuen thouſand footmen, it was feared leſt they would come to inuade the campe. In which regard Monſieur Lautrech countermanded the fiue hundred footmen of Ranſe, which he had ſent after the ouerthrow of Simon Romain, to ſtop the bands of the enemies who were in Calabria from coming towards Naples, and ſent to leuie a thouſand footmen in the countrey thereabout: and retained the Duke of Nola with two hundred light horſmen, and Rinuccio Farneſe with an hundred, whom they promiſed to bring to him forthwith: he countermanded two hundred eſtradiots of the Venetians, who were gone to the enterpriſe of Tarentum: he reuoked vpon great penalties all the men at armes that were in health: he ſolicited dayly the coming of Ranſe, and haſtened (albeit very late) with great vehemencie and efficacie all other prouiſions. By the ſecond day of Auguſt there were ſcarcely an hundred horſe in the French campe, and the Imperials made dayly incurſions euen vp to their trenches: and the night before, they had ſcaled and ſacked Somma, where there was a band of men at armes and light horſemen. Therefore Monſieur Lautrech ſeeing himſelfe almoſt beſieged, ſolicited Monſieur Saint Pol to ſend him ſouldiers by ſea, and the Florentines to turne vnto him the two thouſand footmen whom they had leuied to ſend to Monſieur Saint Pol, which they readily conſented vnto. Monſieur Ciandale who was let go vpon his faith, was dead in the campe: the Prince of Nauarre, Vaudemont, Camillo Triuulce, and the old and new Maiſters of the campe, were ſicke: and alſo all the Embaſſadours, all the Secretaries, and all the men of account, except the Marquis of Saluſſa and the Count Guido: yea, hardly could there be found through the whole campe one body that was ſound. The footmen died of hunger, and almoſt all the ciſternes being drawne drie, there was alſo want of water: and the army could do nothing elſe then ſtand well vpon their guard and defend their campe, expecting ſuccours: and withall negligence increaſed the diſorders. After this, the Spaniards brake vp the water conduit of Poggio Royal, and notwithſtanding it was recouered, yet they could make no vſe of it without great danger. Monſieur Lautrech expected within two dayes the Duke of Somma with fifteene hundred footmen, and ſoone after the bands of horſemen and footmen of the Abbot of Farfa, which Monſieur Lautrech had ſent for when he had defeated the Biſhop Colonno.

At this time the galleys of the Venetians returned very ill armed, and ſo ſlenderly furniſhed with victuals, that to get wherewith to liue, they were driuen to leaue the guard of the port of Naples, and to run all along the ſea ſhores thereabout. The eight day the Spaniards being returned to Somma, made pillage of it againe, and tooke away all the reſidue of the horſes which Count Guido had there in garriſon: they aſſailed alſo the conuoy of victuals, with whom there was two hundred Lanceknights, who flying into two houſes, yeelded themſelues cowardly: by reaſon reason whereof many times there was nothing to eate in the campe: and that which increased all their incommodities, was the great circuite of the place where the army was incamped, which from the beginning was thought too great, for that it caused danger, and consumed the footmen by too much action: and yet Monsieur Lautrech supporting himselfe with the hope of succours, would not heare of restraining it into lesse roome; and being as yet not restored to his former health, he visited all the campe, to maintaine due order of watch and ward, fearing to be assailed. But things declined continually, so that the fifteenth day, by reason of the great puissance of the Imperiall horsemen, there was no more commerce betweene the campe and the galleys, neither could the souldiers of the campe, for want of horses, make any excursions out of the high wayes: and euery night the alarme was giuen twise or thrice; in so much as the souldiers consumed with so many paines and incommodities, could not send out such conuoyes for victuals as was needfull: and that which aggrauated all the disorders, was, that the same night before the sixteenth day, Monsieur Lautrech died, vpon whose authoritie and vertue all matters depended; and it was constantly beleeued, that he fell into the relapse of his disease, by taking too much paines. The charge of gouernment remained to the Marquis of Saluzza, who was not able to support so great a burthen. And disorders increasing dayly, Andrew Dore with twelue galleys arriued at Caietta as souldier to the Emperour, in so much as the French Nauie began to make no more so good guard as they had wont. At that time the Count of Sarny with a thousand Spanish footmen, tooke Sarny, and chased from thence three hundred footmen that were there in garrison: and afterwards marching by night the two and twentieth of August, to Nola with a greater company, he tooke it; and Valerio Vrsin who lay there in garrison retired into the Castle, alleaging that he was deceiued by the men of the countrey: and hauing sent to demand succours of the Marquis of Saluzza, he sent him two thousand footmen, who as they came by night, were assailed by the bands of Naples, and ouerthrowne. The two and twentieth day, the campe being both naked of men and voide of gouernment, stood entertained onely with the hope of the coming of Ranse, who was as yet in Aquila, and was no more desired for the taking of Naples, nor for any hope to be able to resist in that lodging, but onely that they might breake vp with more safetie. Monsieur Vaudemont was dead; and the Marquis of Saluzza, Count Guido, Count Hugo, and Peter of Nauarre were sicke. Maramus to the end to depriue them wholly of victuals, issued out of Naples with foure hundred footmen, and finding Capua almost abandoned, he entred into it, by reason whereof the French men forsaking Pozzuolo, bestowed the garrison that was there in Auersa, a place of very great importance for the campe. But Capua and Nola being lost, the army knew not where to seeke victuals: so that being no longer able to hold out, & vsing the last remedy, they brake vp in the night, to retire to Auersa: but the Imperials had an eye vpon them, & discouering their departure, ouerthrew them in the way, where were taken Peter of Nauarre with many other Chieftaines and men of qualitie, and the Marquis of Saluzza retired with part of the companies into Auersa: whither being followed by the Imperials, and being not able to defend himselfe, he sent out the Count Guido Rangon to parley with the Prince of Orange, and capitulated with him by his meanes: That he should relinquish Auersa, with the Castle, artilleries and munitions: That as well he as the other Captaines should remaine prisoners, except Count Guido, to whom, in recompence of the accord, was granted libertie: That the Marquis should do all that he could with the French men and the Venetians to cause them to render the whole kingdome: That the souldiers and such as by the accord were to haue libertie, should leaue their Enfignes, their armes, their horses, and their goods, granting onely to those that were men of qualitie the seruice of mules and cuttals: That the Italian souldiers should not beare armes against the Emperour for sixe moneths. Thus all the bands were defeated, all the Captaines either dead, or made prisoners, in flying, or by the accord. Auersa was sacked by the Imperiall army, who afterwards retired to Naples demanding eight payes. Ranse who the day following was drawne neare to Capua, with the Prince of Melfe and the Abbot of Farfa, hearing of the aduenture, returned into Abruzza, which country onely, together with certaine peeces in Powille and Calabria, held good for the Confederates. This was the issue of the enterprise of the kingdome of Naples, disordered by many causes, but guided to his last downfall by two principally: The one, for the maladies caused partly by the cutting away of the water-conduits of Poggio Royall, to depriue them within Naples of the meanes to grind: for the waters being dispersed all ouer the plaines, and hauing no issue, so corrupted the aire, that that the French men by nature intemperate and impatient of heate, fell ſicke, whereunto was added the plague, the contagion whereof was carried into the body of the army by certaine infected perſons who were expreſly ſent thither out of Naples. The other, that Monſieur Lautrech who had drawne out of France the moſt part of the beſt experienced Captaines, hoping more then was conuenient, and not remembring what little honour it brought to him at ſuch time as he lay at the defence of the Eſtate of Millan, to write to his King that he would ſtop the enemies ſon paſſing the riuer of Adda, had oftentimes written during this ſiege, that he would take Naples: by reaſon whereof not to falſifie his owne iudgement, he ſtood obſtinate not to leuie the ſiege, contrary to the counſell of the other Captaines, who ſeeing the campe full of maladies, perſwaded him to retire in ſafetie to Capua, or to ſome other place; for that hauing almoſt all the Realme in his hands, he could haue wanted neither victuals nor money, and might haue conſumed the Imperials, to whom all things were wanting.

The proceedings of Monſieur Saint Pol in Lombardie.

In the meane while Lombardie was not at reſt, for that Monſieur Saint Pol when he had aſſembled his forces and made prouiſion of victuals, tooke certaine townes and boroughs beyond Po commanded before by Anthonie de Leua, who the third day of Auguſt was at Torretta, labouring to gather into Millan as great prouiſion of victuals as he could, for that through the whole Eſtate of Millan the harueſts were ſo poore, that it was thought there were ſcarcely ſufficient victuals to feed the people of the countrey for eight moneths: and afterwards he retired to Marignan, not being able alſo for want of money to abide long time in that place: at which time the Duke of Vrbin was at Breſſia, and Monſieur Saint Pol at Newcaſtle in Tortona, from whence being come to Plaiſance, they met and had conference together at Monticella vpon the riuer of Po, and there it was reſolued that the armies ſhould vnite together about Lode. Afterwards Monſieur Saint Pol paſſed the riuer of Po neare to Cremona, they of Plaiſance ſuffering him without ſaying any thing, to take the barkes to make a bridge: and therefore Anthonie de Leua who had at his deuotion the bridge of Caſſan, Cartuaggia and Treuy, he brake down the bridge, and abandoned the places of Guiaradadda, as he had before abandoned Nouaro, but had put into Pauie ſeuen hundred footmen, and fiue hundred into Saint Angelo. Monſieur Saint Pol had foure hundred lances, fiue hundred light horſemen, and fifteene hundred Lanceknights in his pay, but through his owne negligence, and the deceit of his officers, farre leſſe in number. For theſe forces, and for the other companies of Lanceknights & Swiſſers which were expected, the Venetians had agreed to pay for euery moneth twelue thouſand duckats to Monſieur Saint Pol, who had alſo at Turea three hundred Swiſſers, payed for nine hundred and three thouſand footmen French. The Venetians had three hundred men at armes, a thouſand light horſemen, and ſix thouſand footmen: and the Duke of Millan had more then two thouſand footmen of choiſe. Anthonie de Leua had foure thouſand Lanceknights, a thouſand Spaniards, three thouſand Italians, and three hundred light horſemen. The companies of the Confederates paſſed the riuer of Adda, and ioyned their forces together the two and twentieth day of Auguſt, Anthonie de Leua being yet at Marignan. From that place the Duke of Vrbin ſent to Saint Angelo three thouſand footmen, and three hundred light horſemen, with ſixe cannons, vnder the conduct of Iohn of Nalda, who as he was in camping was ſlaine with a bullet from the artilleries, by reaſon whereof he went thither in perſon and tooke the towne. The fiue and twentieth day of Auguſt, the army of the Confederates lodged at Saint Zenon, vpon the riuer of Ambra, which is within two miles and an halfe of Marignan. The ſeuen and twentieth day they paſſed ouer Ambra, and drew neare to Marignan: and as they approched, the Spaniards retired into Marignan to an old rampier, and when they had skirmiſhed many houres, they iſſued out at large; and it was thought they would haue fought: but after the artilleries had played on both ſides the ſpace of an houre, the night now approching, they retired into Marignan and Riozzo, and as the army incamped, they aſſaulted it brauely. The day after, Anthonie de Leua made his retrait with all his companies to Millan, and the Confederates went to Landriana. After this, they tooke counſell whether they ſhould attempt to force Millan, and during that conſultation, the army marched with intention to enter the towne of Millan by ſurpriſe; which enterpriſe was broken by a great ſhowre of raine, which for the foulenеſſe of the way hindered them for going to the gate of Vercell, where they ſhould haue entred. Wherefore ſeeing themſelues diſappointed of this deuice, and being informed by him whom they ſent to take a view of Millan, that this enterpriſe could not be accompliſhed, they determined to go incampe before Pauie by the way of Biagraſſa, for that they

they could not execute any other action, and there was hope to carry it easily, becauſe there was no more then two hundred Lanceknights & eight hundred Italians within it. Thus keeping that way, they ſent out beyond the riuer of Theſin certaine bands of footmen, which tooke Vigeuena: and the ninth day of September Monſieur Saint Pol arriued at Saint Alexis, which is three miles from Pauie; where both the armies approching neare together, there came an aduertiſement which made them more doubtful. For the plague being very hot within Genes, and for that cauſe being almoſt abandoned of euery one, and in like ſort of almoſt all the ſouldiers, and for the ſame danger, Theodore Triuulce who was Gouernour there, being retired into the Caſtle; Andrew Dore taking this occaſion, drew neare the towne with certaine galleys, hauing neuertheleſſe very ſmall hope to force it, for that he had with him but fiue hundred footmen: but the French Nauie that rode in the hauen, fearing leſt their way to returne into France would be cloſed vp, (without taking any care for Genes) hoiſed ſaile to go towards Sauona, and the firſt veſſell that arriued there, was the galley of Monſieur Barbeſieux: ſo that there being but few ſouldiers within the Citie, notwithſtanding Theodore was returned to keepe the Pallace, and the people for the iniury of the libertie giuē to the town of Sauona being enemies to the name of the French, Andrew Dore entred the towne without any great reſiſtance. This foule loſſe happened by the negligence and too great confidence of the King: for that ſuppoſing the matters of Naples weld not ſo ſpeedily fall to ruine, and perſwading himſelfe that in all accidents the retraite of the Nauie to Genes and the neighbourhood of Monſieur Saint Pol, would ſuffice to ſaue it, he omitted to make there ſuch prouiſions as were neceſſary. Theodore who was retired into the Caſtle, demanded ſuccours of Monſieur Saint Pol, giuing him hope to recouer the towne, if there were ſent vnto him forthwith three thouſand footmen: vpon which demand the Captaines of the Confederates conſulting among themſelues, the French men were diſpoſed to go thither preſently with the whole campe: but the Duke of Vrbin ſhewed, that to prouide boates to make a bridge vpon Po, and to prouide neceſſary ſtore of victuals, was a matter of more length then the preſent buſineſſe required: therefore following his counſell, it was determined that Monſieur Monti-Ian ſhould turne to Genes three thouſand Lanceknights and Swiſſers that came out of France to the army of Monſieur Saint Pol, and were already arriued at Alexandria: but if perhaps they would not go thither, that he ſhould bring them to the campe, and in their place ſhould be ſent thither three thouſand other footmen: and that in the meane while they ſhould endeuour to preſſe Pauie: and the Venetians promiſed, that though they tooke not Pauie, yet they would ſuccour Genes with all their companies, ſo farre forth as they might be aſſured of the affaires on that ſide. The ſiege of Pauie therfore was continued, for the accompliſhment whereof the fourteenth day there were planted on this ſide the riuer of Theſin, in the plaine on the lower part, nine cannons which beat vpon a baſtillion adioyning to the Arſenal, which in a few houres was almoſt halfe ruined; and beyond Theſin three cannons, to beate (when the aſſault ſhould be giuen) a flanke that anſwered the Arſenall: and vpon a litle hill on this ſide Theſin fiue cannons which played vpon two other baſtillions: and at the foote of the ſaid litle hill three other cannons which ſhot at the wall: all which artilleries belonged to the Venetians, thoſe of Monſieur Saint Pol ſeruing to beate downe the defences. The day following, Hannibal Captaine of Cremona was come with a trench as farre as the ditch of the baſtillion on that ſide towards the Arſenall, of which two third parts were already reuerſed to the earth; ſo that the ſouldiers within had in a maner abandoned it: on which day Malateſta Soglians, one of the Captains of the Venetians, was ſlaine with a bullet from the artilleries. When the battery had bin continued all the day and the night following, the army prepared to giue the aſſault, much of the wall on all ſides of the three baſtillions, being caſt downe to the earth. But when they went about in the morning to draine the water out of the ditches, they found ſo ſtrong a wall, that they conſumed there all that day and the day following, by which occaſion the aſſault was prolonged till the nineteenth day, when the ditch was cleared of almoſt all the water: on which day the baſtillion at the corner being wonne betimes in the morning, they began to giue the aſſault, and the companies being deuided into three parts, the firſt action appertained to Anthonie de Caſtello with the Venetian regiments, the ſecond to Monſieur de Larges with the ſouldiers of Monſieur Saint Pol, and the laſt to the Captaine of Cremona, with the regiments of the Duke of Vrbin, being twelue hundred footmen: and the Duke of Vrbin came on foote with two hundred men at armes, and aſſronted the baſtillions, which defended themſelues brauely for more then two houres by the valour of two hundred Lanceknights and eight hundred Italians, with a very few Spaniards, who though they behaued themselues valiantly, yet being but few in number, they defended themselues with great difficultie, chiefly for that the artilleries planted beyond Thesin, vncouered all their rampiers. In the assault Peter Birago was hurt in the thigh with the shot of an harquebuze, whereof he died within a few dayes, but he would not haue his bodie remoued from the place, to the end his souldiers might not abandon the assault: and in like sort was wounded with an harquebuze Peter Boticella, who went from the assault; they were both Captaines of the Duke of Millan. At last, two houres before night, they entred the towne with very small hurt, and to the great commendation of the Duke of Vrbin. Of those within there were slaine about seuen hundred, almost all Lanceknights: but when the army began to enter, Galeas Birago retired into the Castle with all the souldiers that remained, together with many men of the towne, which was deliuered wholly to the sack, but by reason it had bin sacked twise before, there was small prey; and the Castle was receiued to composition, for that there was necessity to batter it, and there was no munition in the camp, and the ditches being very large and deep, could not so soone be filled, and there were within it fiue hundred men of warre. These were the capitulations: That the Spaniards with the artilleries and munitions which they could draw with their hands, and with all their baggage, might go to Millan together with the Lanceknights, of whom there remained a very small number: and that the Italians might go whither they would, except Millan.

Pauie being taken, the Duke of Vrbin counselled not to thinke to force Millan, for that it was needfull to haue an army sufficient for two batteries: but to the end greatly to endomage it, to take Biagrassa, Saint George, Monce and Coma; and that care might be had to succour Genes. For though the Lanceknights and Swissers had made answer to Monsieur Monti-Ian that they would go to Genes, yet the Lanceknights for that they were not payed, returned to Turea, in so much as no succours were gone to the Castle, which Andrew Dore laboured to vndermine with all diligence. And for this cause Monsieur Saint Pol who had but an hundred Lances and two thousand footmen, prepared the seuen and twentieth day to go to the succours of Genes, and passed Po at Portostella in the mouth of Thesin, drawing towards Tortona, with promise to turne backe againe, if he perceiued his succours could not helpe: and the Duke of Vrbin in the meane while should expect him at Pauie, with whom there remained foure thousand Venetian footmen and a thousand of the regiments of the Duke of Millan. At this time Anthonie de Leua who was retired to Millan, forbad that no man should make bread or keepe any meale in their houses, except such as had bought the tribute of it, who payed vnto him for the space of nine moneths three duckats for euery measure of meale: with which mony he paied all that time the horsemen, the Spaniards and the Lanceknights; which did not onely defend him from the present danger, but entertained him all the Winter following, hauing dispersed his regiments of Italian footmen within Nouaro and certaine townes of Lomellina, and in the villages of the territory of Millan; in which places he gaue sufferance to the souldiers all the Winter to spoile and ransome the poore people. The first day of October Monsieur Saint Pol arriued at Gauy, a place within fiue and twentie miles of Genes, hauing left his artilleries at Noui. The day following he tooke the Rocke and the borough of Fornari, and when he passed further towards Genes where there was entred seuen hundred Corsikans, he returned againe to the borough of Fornari: and by reason of his want of money, he had not with him in all aboue foure thousand footmen, as well of his owne as of the companies of Monti-Ian, and a thousand who had bin sent from the campe with Nicholas Dore: and those few that were with him, passed away continually into France; so that despairing of the enterprise, he sent Monti-Ian with three hundred footmen to Sauona, before which towne the Genowayes were incamped: but they could not enter, for that it was enuironed with trenches, and all the passages taken. The tenth day of October he retired into Alexandria, and afterwards to Senazzara betweene Alexandria and Pauie, to haue conference with the Duke of Vrbin, but he was almost left without souldiers; and there consulting of the common affaires, and the Duke declaring that of all the souldiers, as well of the Venetians as of the Duke of Millan, there remained but foure thousand footmen, and that Anthonie de Leua had, what without and within Millan foure thousand Lanceknights, fixe hundred Spaniards, and foureteene hundred Italians, it was resolued that the Duke should retire to Pauie, and Monsieur Saint Pol to Alexandria; which was accorded vnto him by the Duke of Millan: and there was speech of entertaining new ſupplies of footmen; and then, if the time permitted, to execute the enterpriſe of Biagraſſa, Mortara, and the Caſtle of Nouaro. But it happened the one and twentieth day of October, that the inhabitants of Sauona ſeeing Monti-Ian could not enter, they agreed to render the towne, if they were not reſcued within certaine dayes: and therefore Monſieur Saint Pol who was deſirous to relieue it, but had no more ſouldiers then a thouſand footmen, required a ſupply of three thouſand footmen of the Duke of Vrbin and the Duke of Millan, who ſent him onely twelue hundred: in ſo much as hauing no aſſurance to be able to reſcue it with ſo ſmall a number of ſouldiers, he ſuffered it to be loſt: and when the Genowayes had obtained it, they filled the hauen with ſtones, to the end to make it vnprofitable. At which time Theodore Triuulce deſpairing to be ſuccoured, and being without mony, he rendred the litle Caſtle by compoſition. As ſoone as the Caſtle was conquered, it was (in a popular furie) razed by the Genowayes, who with the authoritie of Andrew Dore eſtabliſhed in that Citie a new gouernment, ſuch as had bin debated afore vnder the name of libertie: the ſubſtance whereof was, that by a Counſell of foure hundred Citizens ſhould be created all the Magiſtrates and dignities of their Citie, but chiefly the Duke and ſupreme Magiſtrate for the terme of two yeares; abrogating the law whereby the Gentlemen were before excluded therefrom. And whereas the chiefeſt foundation of preſeruing their libertie was, to labour to reconcile the diuiſions of the Citizens, which of long time had bene there more great and hurtfull then in any other Citie of Italy (ſeeing there was not onely one diuiſion, but the oppoſite faction of Guelfes and Gibelins: that betweene the Gentlemen and the populars, which populars alſo were not at vnitie among themſelues: and the moſt mightie faction betweene the Adorneys and the Fregoſoes: by reaſon of which diuiſions, it might be thought that that Citie, very conuenient to command the ſea, as well for the ſituation as for the knowledge of marine matters, had bin depreſſed, and for a long time almoſt in a continuall ſubiection:) therefore to cure that euill euen to the roote, extinguiſhing the names of all the families & houſes of the Citie, they conſerued & retained onely the name of eight and twentie of the moſt worthy and honourable, except the Adorneys and Fregoſoes, which they vtterly ſuppreſſed: vnder the name and number of which families, they gathered all thoſe Gentlemen and Yeomen who remained without name of their houſes: and the better to confound the memory of all factions, they ioyned the families of the Gentlemen with the houſes of the populars, and reciprocally the names of the populars with the Gentlemen: ſuch as had bin partners with the Adorneys, they coupled with thoſe that had followed the name of the Fregoſoes, and ſo of the contrary the Fregoſoes with the Adorneys. And it was ordained, that there ſhould be no diſtinction betweene them, that might hinder any one of them from aſpiring to honours and magiſtracies: by which mixture of men and names, they hoped to obtaine, that within a few yeares the peſtiferous memory of factions would be extinguiſhed: and in the meane while the authoritie of Andrew Dore remaining great among them, without whoſe conſent (for the reputation of the man, and becauſe of the Gallies which he had of the Emperour, the which when they were not in action, remained in the port of Genes, and for his other conditions) they would make no deliberation of any matter of great importance: and that which made his puiſſance and greatneſſe leſſe troubleſome, was, that the treaſure was not diſpoſed of by his direction; and he medled not with the election of the Duke and other Magiſtrates, nor with particular and leſſe matters: ſo that the Citizens being peaceable, and more inclined to merchandize then to ambition, remembring chiefly the trauels and ſubiections paſt, they had great cauſe to loue that forme of gouernment. After this, the French fleet and the nauie of Andrew Dore buckled together betweene Monaco and Nice, where one of Dores gallies was ſunke. After the loſſe of Sauona, the Duke of Vrbin and Monſieur Saint Pol met together againe at Senare, betweene Alexandria and Pauie: where the Duke of Vrbin reſolued to paſſe to the other ſide of the riuer of Adda, leauing the guard of Pauie to the Duke of Millan, and counſelling Monſieur Saint Pol to ſpend the Winter in Alexandria, which was a matter not very pleaſing vnto them, and wherewith not onely the Kings officers were diſcontented, but alſo the King himſelfe (not taking for paiment certaine light excuſes which the Venetians made to him) complained much, that they had not ſuccoured the Caſtle of Genes, and the Citie of Sauona, which the Genowayes had deformed. After this, a ſupply of a thouſand Lanceknights came to Monſieur Saint Pol, with whom, accounting the thouſand footmen which Villaceca had in Lomellina, there remained foure thouſand footmen. At this time there happened a tumult in the Marquisdome of Salussa: for that after the death of the Marquis Michael Anthonie, the Lord Francis his brother hauing seized vpon the iurisdiction by reason that Gabriel the second brother to Anthonie, euen in the life of his eldest brother, by direction of the mother, who had managed the gouernment of the children during their minoritie, had bin kept prisoner in the Rocke of Ranel, vnder colour that he was as it were mad: it happened that the Captaine of the Rocke deliuered him; by which meanes seizing vpon the mother who had holden him prisoner, and being acknowledged by the people, he conquered the whole Estate, from whence his brother fled, who soone after got into Carmignola, where, hauing reassembled his forces, he ouerthrew his brother Gabriel.

Monti Lan misseth to surprise Andrew Dore.

There passed no more matters of consequence in Lombardie for this yeare, sauing that the Count Caiazze ranne vp euen to Millan, taking aduantage vpon the negligence of the Venetians, who omitted to send Monsieur Saint Pol the forces they had promised for the enterprise of Seranalle, Gauy, and other places of the Genowayes. There was also attempted an action of importance: for Monti-Ian and Villacerca with two thousand footmen and fiftie horsemen, departed in the euening from Vitade, to surprise Andrew Dore in his Pallace, which standing on that side towards the sea, was close to the walls of Genes: but this plot tooke no effect, for that the footmen being wearied with the longnesse of the way, which was two and twentie miles, could not arriue in the night, but when it was now some houres in the day, so that the alarme being raised, Andrew Dore conueying himselfe out at the backside, leaped into a barke, and by that meanes auoided the danger: and the French men without doing any other thing then sack the Pallace, returned in safetie. Also the Count Caiazze hauing layd an ambush betweene Millan and Monce, ouerthrew fiue hundred Lanceknights and an hundred light horsemen, who went to safe-conduct the victuallers: but being afterwards sent to Bergama, he so afflicted that Citie with pillage and robbing, that the Senate of Venice, who had established him Captaine generall ouer the infanterie, not being able to endure so great insolencie and auarice, cassiered him, and put him with infamy out of their pay. About this time the Spaniards tooke the towne of Vigeuena, and Belgioioso who was escaped out of the hands of the French men, being sent by Anthonie de Leua with two thousand footmen to surprise Pauie, wherein was a garrison of fiue hundred footmen of the Duke of Millan, presented himselfe one night before the walls, but being discouered, he was compelled to retire without doing any thing. There arriued in the countrey of Genes two thousand Spaniards, whom the Emperour sent out of Spaine to defend Genes, or to go to Millan, according to the occasion of affaires, to whom Belgioioso went to conduct them: Monsieur Saint Pol prepared himselfe to stop the coming of these footmen, who made shew that they would take the way either of Casale or Plaisance, and made instance that the Venetian bands would make themselues strong at Loda, to the end that the bands of Millan might not backe them: he laboured also to perswade them to execute ioyntly the enterprise of Millan, whereunto he was encouraged by the want of victuals, and the despaire of that people, which the Duke of Vrbin disswaded: but the Venetians proceeded coldly in great and braue actions, and at that time much more, for that by reason of the report of Andrew Nauager their Embassadour who was returned out of Spaine, made in fauour of the Emperour, and in regard of a certaine practise and intelligence which was entertained at Rome with the Emperours Embassadour, the opinions of the Senate were diuers, many inclining to accord with the Emperour: and yet at last it was resolued to continue the confederation with the French King. At which time Torniello hauing passed the riuer of Thesin with two thousand footmen, tooke Basignan, and went towards Lomellina: and the Abbot of Farfa going with his horsemen to Cresoentin, a place belonging to the Duke of Sauoy, was defeated by night and taken prisoner: but being deliuered by the meanes of the Marquis of Montferrat and the Marquis of Mus, he ouerthrew certaine souldiers of Anthonie de Leua, and tooke their artilleries. It was doubted lest the Pope adhered to the Emperours part, for that the Cardinall Saint Crosse being arriued at Naples, caused three Cardinals who were there in hostage to be deliuered, and the rumour ran, that he had commission from the Emperour to cause Ostia and Ciuitauecchia to be rendred: and by his meanes (the Pope being also solicited) Andrew Dore restored Porthercule to the Siennois. But it was dayly more and more discouered that the Popes mind was inclined to innouation, for that by his meanes (though secretly) Braccio Baillon in regard of the affaires of Perousa, molested Malatesta, notwithstanding he was in his pay: and when he vnderstood that the Duke of Ferrara was come to Modena, he conspired to take him in his returne to Ferrara with an ambush of two hundred horsemen laid by Paul Lucasso at the house of the Coppio, vpon the confines of Modena: but for that the Duke stirred not out of Modena, the deuice was disclosed. The Realme of Naples at this time was not entirely deliuered of the calamities of the warre notwithstanding the ouerthrow of the French: for that Simon Renzo hauing assembled new companies, had taken Mesa, Orbi, and Amigdalara, townes standing vpon the sea side at the point of the Appenine; and Federike Caraffa, whom the Duke of Vrbino had sent with a thousand footmen, and many others of the countrey being ioyned with him, he had an army not to be despised: but after the victory of the Imperials about Naples, seeing himselfe abandoned of the companies of the Duke of Grauina, he tooke Barletta, whereinto he entred by the Castle, and stayed there: the Venetians holding at the same time Trany guarded by Camilla, and Monopoly defended by John Conrado, both of the family of the Vrsins. After this Renze de Cere and the Prince of Melfe came into the kingdome with a thousand footmen, who being reduced betweene Nocera and Gualdo, and afterwards retiring thence by the commandement of the Pope, who would not offend the minds of the victors, they embarked themselues at Sinigaly, & went by sea to Barletta, with intention to renew the warre in Pouille, a matter determined by common consent of the Confederates, to the end to constraine the Imperiall army to make their abode in the kingdome of Naples vntill the Spring time, at what time they spake of making new prouisions for the common good. And for this cause, the French king sent to Renze succours of money: and the Venetians who desired the like, the rather to retaine more easily by the helpe of others, the townes which they had taken in Pouille, offered to furnish him of twelue gallies: but when the King vrged them to arme those gallies, and that the expences should be accounted vpon the fourescore thousand duckats wherevnto they were bound by the contribution promised to Monsieur Lautrech, they would not hearken to it. The King of England promised not to be behind in the ordinary prouisions: and the Florentines had contracted to pay the third part of the companies which Renze had leuied. The Imperials shewed no great readinesse to quench so great a fire, being busied in getting of money to pay the souldiers that which was due to them for the time past. And to leuie those exactions with more facilitie, and to assure the kingdome with examples of seueritie, the Prince of Orange caused Federike Carraza some to the Duke of Trayetto, and Henrie Pandon Duke of Bouiano, a descendant of one of the daughters of old Ferdinand King of Naples, together with foure other Neapolitans, to be beheaded publikly in the market place of Naples, where the plague was very hote, vsing the same punishment in other places also of the kingdome: by which example hauing astonished the minds of all men, he proceeded against the absent that had followed the French faction, and made confiscation of their goods, which afterwards he compounded for with money, forgetting no extremitie, to get as much treasure as he could: and all these things were managed by the wit of Ierome Moron, to whom was giuen in recompence of his seruices the Duchie of Bouiano. To these emotions was added, that in Abruzza Iohn Iaques Franco entred for the French king into Matrice, which is neare to Aquila, by reason whereof all the countrey was in commotion, and they were in feare in Aquila, where lay sicke Sarra Colonna with fiue hundred footmen. Furthermore, the Venetians made prouision for the affaires of Pouille, and sent by sea certaine light horsemen to furnish Barletta, and part of the vessels that carried them perished in the lakes of Barletta and Trany, where their Treasurer was drowned, who was in a Skiffe: and the horsemen, who had for their Leader Iohn Conrado Vrsin, being sore beaten with the rage of the tempest, fell into the hands of the Imperials: and Iohn Paul de Cere, who made shipwracke neare Guasto, remained prisoner to the Marquis. In the end of the yeare, the region of Aquila became for the League, by the meanes of the Bishop of that Citie, and of the Count Montorio, with other of the exiles, and the cause was, for that they were hardly vsed by the Imperials.

Executions at Naples.

Now followeth the yeare 1529. in the beginning whereof there appeared on all sides signes of disposition to peace, which in all likelihood was to be negociated in the Popes Court. For when it was knowne that the Cardinall Saint Croisse (such was the title of the Spanish Generall) was gone vp to Rome with warrant from the Emperour to conclude a peace; the French King, who had a great desire thereof, sent a commission to his Embassadours, and the King of England sent Embassadours to Rome for the same cause. Which practises ioyned to the trauell and marineſſe of Princes, cauſed the Confederates to proceed ſlowly in the prouiſions of war; and in Lombardie their greateſt care was, how the Spaniards that were come to Genes might paſſeon Millan, from whence their Launceknights for want of pay, were almoſt all gone away: and to conclude, there the Duke Palgioneſe with an hundred horſemen was gone vp as farre as Caſa; and from thence he came to Genes in a diſguiſed habite, from whence he led the ſaid Spaniards to Seruia, with intention to gather together fiue hundred more newly come out of Spaine, who were landed at Hellefranche. But to the Realme of Naples the Imperials doubting leſt the rebellion of Aquila and Matrice, together with the ſtirres that had bin made in Powilla, might breed ſome matter of farre greater importance, they determined to conuert ſuch forces as they had to the ſuppreſſion of thoſe places. Therefore it was reſolued that the Marquis of Guaſt with his Spaniſh footmen, ſhould go to recouer the townes of Powilla: and that the Prince of Orange likewiſe with the Launceknights ſhould go to recouer Aquila and Matrice: who as ſoone as he approached Aquila, they that were within iſſued out, and the Prince compounded for the Citie and the countrey for an hundred thouſand duckats, and tooke from them alſo the ſhrine of ſilver which the French king Lewis the tenth had dedicated to Saint Bernard. From thence he ſent ſouldiers to Matrice, where lay in garriſon Camillo Pardo with foure hundred footmen, who was gone away not many dayes before, with promiſe to returne againe: but either for feare, becauſe there was no wine, the water being cut off, and the townesmen at diſcord with the ſouldiers, or for ſome other reaſon, not onely he returned not, but alſo he gaue them not all the money which the Florentines had ſent vnto him to defend that place: ſo that the ſouldiers went their way ouer the walls, and the towne rendred. By reaſon of which happie ſucceſſes it was feared leſt the Prince of Orange would paſſe into Toſcan at the inſtance of the Pope, who being deliuered of a moſt dangerous, but ſhort diſeaſe, ceaſſed not to ſolicite, and giue hopes to euery one. For he promiſed the French men to ſticke to the League, if Rauenna and Seruia were rendred vnto him: and to compound vnder reaſonable conditions with the Florentines and the Duke of Ferrara, who at the paiments of the money made before to Monſieur Lautrech, had affirmed that he payed it of his liberalitie, and not by vertue of obligation, ſeeing the Pope had not ratified it. On the other ſide, hauing recouered (though with great charges) the Caſtles of Oſtia and Ciuitauecchia, by vertue of a commiſſion which the Cardinall Saint Croſſe had brought, he entertained with the Emperour practiſes more ſecret, and more certaine; and they debated together rather of their affaires particular (with a more ſecret and ſolid foundation then before) then of the vniuerſall, tending to peace. But in Powilla the ſtate of affaires was this: Barletta was holden for the French king, in the which was Ranſe de Cere, and with him the Prince of Melfe, Federike Caraffa, Simon Romain, Camillo Pardo, Galeas Farneſe, John Conrard Vrſin, and the Prince of Stigliano. The Venetians held Trany, Polignany, and Monopoly, and had in theſe places two thouſand footmen, and ſixe hundred light horſemen Albanois, whereof two hundred were within Monopoly. They held alſo the port of Biellry. Now when the French king had in the beginning ſent a ſmall ſumme of money to thoſe companies, he made no prouiſion, neither did he accept the welue bodies of gallies offered to him by the Venetians, who loſt three gallies in the lake of Biellry, with a great Foiſt, as they went to reuictuall Trany and Barletta: and they had loſt fiue more at ſundry times, whereof notwithſtanding they recouered the artilleries & the other equipage. The French men held alſo the Mount Saint Angelo, and Nardo in the quarter of Ottranto, and Caſtro, wherein was the Count Dugento: and the warre being performed by the men of the kingdome and the forces of the countrey, many rebels to the Emperour were aſſembled in ſundry places, and many alſo who as aduenturers followed the warre for pillage onely: ſo that the condition of the countrey was more miſerable then any man would haue beleeued, being wholly expoſed to robberies, preyes, ranſomes, and burning on all ſides: but the incurſions of Simon Romain were more famous then any other, who ouer-running with his light horſemen and a band of two hundred and fiftie footmen all the parts thereabouts, brought oftentimes into Barletta cattell, corne, and all other things: and iſſuing ſometimes with a great number of footmen, he ſacked, either by ſurpriſe, or by force, now this towne, and then another, as it happened to Canoſa, whereinto being entred in the night by the benefit of ladders, he ſacked it, and tooke away many horſes that belonged to the fortie men at armes that lay in the Caſtle. At laſt the Marquis of Guaſt forbearing to attempt any thing againſt Barletta, being a ſtrong towne and wel fortified, he incamped in March before the towne of Monopoly with foure thouſand Spaniards

and two thousand Italians for the Lanceknights being fiue and twentie hundred in number staying in Abruzzo, refused to go to Pouilla. He incamped in a small valley, so couered with the mountaine, that he could not be endomaged with the artilleries of the towne: wherein were Camillo Vrsino and Iohn Hotterio Treasurer, to whom Ranse sent speedily vpon the gallies three hundred footmen. Monopoly being a towne of small circuite, hath the sea on three sides of it, and towards the land there is a wall of three hundred or three hundred and fiftie paces, with a ditch about it. The Marquis caused a bastillion to be made ouer against the wall, within the shot of an harquebuze, and two others vpon the sea shore, on either side one: but these being so far off, beat the sea, and the gate towards the sea, to keepe the gallies from bringing in any succours or victuals. In the beginning of Aprill the Marquis gaue the assault to Monopoly, where he lost more then fiue hundred souldiers and many pioners, besides three peeces of artilleries that were broken; and then he retired a mile and a halfe, for that the artilleries out of the towne endomaged him much: so that the Venetians in a sally assailed the bastillions which he had made, making slaughter of more then an hundred men, and assured the port with a bastillion made vpon the shore right ouer against that of the enemies. The Marquis approched to Monopoly againe, and made two cauallieis to beare into the inner parts of the towne, and trenches, to leade him euen vnto their ditches, to fill them with fixe hundred loades of bauins: but shortly after, two hundred footmen that issued out of Monopoly burned that bastillion. Afterwards the Marquis approching with a trench directly to the battery, and hauing made another trench towards the lodging of the Spaniards within a stones cast of the ditch, and fortified a bastillion behind, he planted his artilleries vpon it, and beare downe three score fadomes of the next wall within foure fadomes of the earth: but vnderstanding that the same night were entred new companies sent by Ranse, he retired his artilleries, and consequently the end of the moneth of May drawing on, he raised his campe. Whilest the campe was before Monopoly, and after it was retired from thence, there were diuers factions and emotions, for those of Barletta did great harmes and domages; and the souldiers that were in mount Saint Angelo, hauing for Commander Federike Caraffa, tooke Saint Seuero, and succouring the towne of Vico, they compelled the Imperials to leuie their campe from thence. After this, Caraffa went by sea with fixe and twentie saile to Lanciano, where lay an hundred & threescore men at armes, & entring the place by force, he brought away three hundred horse of seruice, and a great bootie, without leauing there any garrison. There were also many exiles who did great harmes in Basilicata; by reason of which difficulties the Imperials were much hindred in gathering the taxes and impositions. And it was not to be doubted, if the French king had sent money and any succours, but there had happened new difficulties to the Imperials throughout the whole kingdome, by reason whereof the Emperours army would at least haue had worke enough to defend that which they held. But such disordred and tumultuous companies being without any succours or refreshing (for the Florentines onely ministred in some sort to Ranse) could in the end do no action of great consequence; seeing withall the Duke of Ferrara refused to send to Ranse by sea foure peeces of artilleries, and the store of money and corne began already to diminish within Barletta: and about fixe hundred rebels of the countrey of Calabria, besieged by the Viceroy within Montlion, being driuen for want of munition and victuals to render the place, were led prisoners to Naples. Afterwards the Prince of Melfe with the army by sea, and Federike Caraffa by land, went to incampe before Malfetta, a place aforetime belonging to the Prince, where Federike as he fought was slaine with the blow of a stone: for whose death the Prince being wroth, when he had taken the towne by force, he sacked it. A like misaduenture befell Simon Romain, for that the Venetian army, which from the cape of Ottranta vexed all the countrey, being drawne neare to Brundusium, they set on land certaine companies of souldiers (with whom was Simon Romain) and tooke the towne; but in assaulting the Rocke, Simon was slaine with a bullet from the artilleries.

Whilest matters went thus in the Realme of Naples, Lombardie remained not in rest: for that Monsieur Saint Pol about the end of March tooke Serraualle by force, and the Castle compounded to stand neuter. But the enemies being secretly entred in the night, he feared he could no longer hinder the Spaniards from coming to Millan, chiefly for that his numbers diminished dayly for want of money, whereof he receiued but very litle from the King, and that litle being partly employed to his owne vse, and partly imbeaseled by the officers for want of good gouernment. The King and the Venetians disputed what enterprise were good to take in hand: and the King made instance for Genes, for the importance of that Citie, chiefly for that it was holden for certaine, that the Emperour would passe into Italy the next Sommer: and for as much as the King saw that the Venetians had neuer holpen him either to succour or recouer Genes, although they excused themselues vpon the rumour which they said ranne through all Italy of the descending of new Lanceknights, he doubted lest they were ill contented with the successe of that enterprise. But the Venetians alleaging that there remained but a small number of souldiers with Anthonie de Leua, and offering when Millan was conquered to send companies to the siege of Genes, it was resolued by the Kings consent to embrace the enterprise of Millan with sixteene thousand footmen at the common charges. This resolution was made in March, the Duke of Vrbin being absent, who, for that the Prince of Orange and the Lanceknights were drawne neare the confines of the kingdome, was retired into his owne Estate, almost against the will of the Venetians: neuertheless the Venetians retained him againe into their pay, with the same conditions which aforetime Bartholmew Aluiano and the Count Petillano had obtained of them, and sent him three hundred horsemen and three thousand footmen for his defence, as they were bound, and gaue the title of Gouernour to Ianus Fregoso. There was in the army of the Venetians sixe hundred men at armes, a thousand light horsemen, and foure thousand footmen, notwithstanding they were bound to maintaine twelue thousand: which army tooke Cassiano by force the sixt day of Aprill, the Rocke rendring to discretion; and Anthonie de Leua and Torniello who were come out of Millan to diuert the enemies, returned backe without doing any thing. The passage from Genes to Millan succeeded well to the Spaniards, notwithstanding there had bin so many practises and consultations vsed to stop them. For Monsieur Saint Pol and the Venetians being of opinion that they would endeuour to passe by the territories of Tortona and Alexandria; at their departure from Voltaggio they tooke (according to the direction of Belgioioso) the longer way by the mountaine of Plaisance and the places subiect to the Church: and being come to Varsi in the said mountaine, notwithstanding Monsieur Saint Pol caused an hundred and fiftie horsemen to march thither, and sent aduertisement of their marching to Lodi, and to the Venetian companies, who, that they might hinder them, sent part of their bands to the Duke of Millan, but one day later then they should, and in lesse numbers then they promised; yet they passed Po by night at Arena, vsing the seruice of the vessels of Plaisance: so that being no more able to stop their vniting with Anthonie de Leua, who for the more facilitie thereof was come to Landriano, within twelue miles of Pauie, they ioyned with him, and being conducted to Millan, so poore and naked of all things, that they bore the resemblance of rogues, they increased the calamities of the Millanois, robbing them euen in the streets. Thus the proiects which the French and the Venetians had layed all the Winter, were to no purpose, which were to stop the passage of these footmen, to take Gauy, and the places enuironing in regard of Genes, and Case, which did great domages to the whole countrey. Moreouer Anthonie de Leua tooke Binasque also by composition. But because the Spaniards had serued their turnes of the Barks of Plaisance, & because it was beleeued, they had not remoued but with assurance that in case of necessitie they might retire into that Citie, together with many other apparences, it augmented the suspition of the Confederates (specially when they saw the restitution of the Castle) that the Pope either was accorded, or would accord with the Emperour.

Deuices of the Pope to restore his house into Florence.

Now so it is, that though the Pope, who in his heart desired aboue all things to recouer the Estate of Florence, circumuenting the French Embassadours, he entertained sundrie practises, and propounded diuers hopes to them and the other Confederates to enter league with them: neuertheles being partly moued with feare of the greatnes of the Emperor and the prosperitie of his successes, and partly through hope to induce him more easily then he could induce the French king, to restore his house into Florence, he inclined more on the Emperours side then to the French king. He had also a vehement desire to make easie this designe, to draw to his deuotion the Estate of Perousa; and it was beleeued, that for this cause he entertained Braccio Baillon, who managed euery day new practises in those quarters: by reason whereof Malatesta, doubting, lest whilest he was in his pay, he should be oppressed with his fauour, thought it necessary to seeke to put himselfe into the protection of some other: and therefore being incited either with that cause, or with the couetousnesse of greater things, or with an ancient hatred,

he

he refuſed to reenter into his pay, pretending that he was not bound for the whole yeare, for that, as he alleaged, there was nothing ſet downe in writing, notwithſtanding the Pope maintained that he was bound. He ſolicited therefore to enter into the pay of the French King and the Florentines, complaining of the practiſes entertained againſt him by the Cardinall of Cortona, and of a letter which he had ſurpriſed, written by the Cardinall de Medicis to Braccio Baillon. But the Pope ſeeking indirectly to ſtop this matter, forbad by publike Edicts, that none of his ſubiects without his leaue, ſhould take the pay of other Princes, vpon paine of confiſcation: and yet for all that Malateſta forbare not to proſecute his deuice: to whom the French men bound themſelues to giue him two hundred horſemen, two thouſand crownes penſion, the Order of Saint Michael, and two thouſand footmen in time of warre: and the Florentines gaue him the title of Gouernour, two thouſand crownes penſion, a thouſand footmen in time of warre, fiftie horſemen for his ſonne, and fiftie for the ſon of Horacio, with fiue hundred crownes for the maintainance of them both. They tooke vpon them the protection of his Eſtate of Perouſa; and the French king and they together, gaue him an hundred crownes a moneth in time of peace, to entertaine ten Captaines: and alſo the Florentines payed him for two hundred footmen for the guard of Perouſa. And for his part, he bound himſelfe to march for their ſeruice with a thouſand footmen when their affaires ſo required, yea though he ſhould not haue the bands promiſed him by the French king. The Pope complained much hereof to the French king, as a matter done directly to let him for diſpoſing according to his owne will, of a Citie ſubiect to the Church, inſomuch as the King (not to prouoke the Pope) deferred to ratifie it: and therefore the Pope hoping that Malateſta might be remoued from that mind, he perſwaded him to continue out his yeare; and at the ſame time he entertained ſecretly Braccio Baillon, Sarra Colonno, and the exiles of Perouſa, who when they had aſſembled bands of ſouldiers, incamped themſelues at Norcia. But all theſe practiſes ſerued to no purpoſe, for that Malateſta was reſolued not to continue in the Popes pay; and the Florentines aiding him openly, he feared not theſe emotions, which ceaſſed forthwith, the Pope knowing they ſufficed not to accompliſh his deſignes. Beſides, the Pope would not ſuffer the Duke of Ferrara to dwell in reſt, and was ſo farre from obſeruing the couenants made with the Duke in the name of the Colledge of Cardinals, that the Biſhoprick of Modena being newly fallen void by the death of the Cardinall Gonzaga, which had bene promiſed to the Dukes ſonne by the ſaid couenants, he conferred it vpon a ſonne of Ierome Morons, ſeeking, by denying the poſſeſſion, an occaſion to prouoke againſt the Duke ſuch a perſonage who had great authoritie in the armie of the Emperour. He entertained alſo a practiſe with Ierome Pio to occupie Reggio, and that by the meanes of Hubert de Gambaro Gouernour of Bolognia: but the Duke being informed of this practiſe, he chaſtiſed Pio as he deſerued. He layed plots alſo to ſurpriſe Rauenna, which likewiſe ſorted not to effect. At which time his mind inclining dayly to the Emperours part, and matters being now in good forwardneſſe, he ſent vnto him the Biſhop of Vaſone his Steward. He called backe the cauſe of diuorce of the King of England, which he would haue done long before, had not the regard of the Bull which was already in England in the hands of his Legate Campeius, retained him. For the affaires of the Emperour being increaſed in Italy, he would not onely not offend him any more, but rather reuoke the offence he had made: ſo that hauing determined euen before he was ſicke, to reuoke the cauſe, he ſent Francis Campagna into England to the Cardinall Campeius, informing the King that he was ſent for other matters, which notwithſtanding concerned the ſame cauſe, but with commiſſion to Campeius to burne the Bull: the which albeit he deferred to performe, becauſe of the ſicknes whereinto the Pope was fallen, yet when he was recouered, he executed his command: ſo that the Pope being deliuered of that feare, reuoked the cauſe, with the great indignation of that King, eſpecially when demanding the Bull of the Cardinall, he vnderſtood what had happened. Theſe things were the cauſe of the ruine of the Cardinall of Yorke, for that the King ſuppoſed the authoritie of the Cardinall to be ſo great with the Pope, that if his mariage with the Ladie Anne had bene pleaſing to him, he might haue obtained of the Pope what diſpenſation he would. By which occaſion opening his eares to the enuie and calumniations of his aduerſaries, he tooke from him all his mony, and goods of wonderfull value, and leauing him a ſmall part of the reuenues of his Benefices, he reſtrained him to his Biſhopricke, with a ſlender traine of ſeruants: and not long after, either for a ſurpriſe of letters which he wrote to the French king, or for ſome other cauſe (at the incitation

of his ſaid aduerſaries, who gathering by the Kings ſpeeches, that he was ſomewhat inclined towards him, feared leſt he would recouer his former authoritie) he was conuented to appeare before the Councell to ſpeake for himſelfe in matters obiected againſt him: for which cauſe, being brought to the Court as priſoner, and a fluxe ſeizing vpon him by the way, either through ſpite or feare, he died the ſecond day of his ſickneſſe; an example in our dayes very memorable of the power of Fortune and Enuie in the Courts of Princes.

At this time there happened at Florence, to the great preiudice of the gouernment that then was, a new alteration againſt Nicholas Cappony Gonfalonnier, almoſt vpon the end of the ſecond yeare of his Magiſtracie, which was cauſed principally by the enuie of ſome of the chiefe Citizens, who by occaſion made vſe of the vaine ſuſpition and ignorance of the Commons. Nicholas Cappony, during all the time of his Magiſtracie, had two principall obiects, the one, to defend againſt freſh enuie thoſe that had bene honoured by the Medices, yea endeuouring that the principals among them might communicate with the other Citizens in the honours and publike counſels: and the other, not to exaſperate the mind of the Pope in matters which were not of importance touching the libertie: both which things were found very profitable to the cõmonwealth. For many, euen of thoſe who were perſecuted as enemies to the gouernment, being ſecure, and kindly vſed, would haue bene firmly conioyned with the others to preſerue the ſtate, knowing withall, that the Pope, for matters happening in the times when the gouernment changed, was ill contented with them. And touching the Pope, albeit he deſired vehemently the returne of his kinſmen, yet hauing no new prouocation, he had ſo much the leſſe occaſion to deale raſhly, and to complaine (as he did continually) to other Princes. But againſt theſe matters was oppoſed the ambition of ſome, who, knowing that if ſuch ſhould be admitted to the gouernment who had bin friends to the Medices, and were without doubt men of moſt experience and valour, that their authoritie would be the leſſe, laboured after nothing more, then to keepe the common people full of ſuſpition againſt the Pope and againſt them, ſlandering the Gonfalonnier, as well for theſe cauſes, as to the end he might not continue in the Magiſtracie for the third yeare, charging him that he had not a mind ſo farre eſtranged from the family of the Medices, as the intereſt and profite of the Commonweale required. For which ſlanders Cappoui was nothing moued, and holding it very neceſſary not to haue the Pope incenſed, he entertained him priuatly with letters and embaſſages; and yet he neither began nor proſecuted any ſuch practiſes without the continuall priuitie and knowledge of ſome ſuch as were Principals and chiefe Magiſtrates, nor for any other end, then to retaine him from ſome act of precipitation. But a letter that he had receiued from Rome falling from him by fortune, wherein there were certaine words that might breed ſuſpition in ſuch as knew not the ground and foundation of theſe things, and this letter coming into the hands of ſome of thoſe that ſate and managed the ſupreme function, there were certaine yong men aroſe in ſedition, and by force of armes made themſelues maiſters of the publike Pallace, retaining the Gonfalonnier as priſoner, and when they had called together in maner of a tumult, almoſt all the Magiſtrates, and many Citizens, they determined to depriue him of the Magiſtracie; which being approued in the great Councell, his cauſe was afterwards referred to the examination of the law, wherein being abſolued by iudgement, he was accompanied with almoſt all the Nobilitie, euen to his houſe with great honour: and in his place was preferred Francis Carducci, a perſonage vnworthy of ſuch a dignitie, if regard be had to his life paſſed, his manners, and his euill ends and intentions.

Now they began to ſtirre againe in Lombardie, Monſieur Saint Pol hauing paſſed the riuer of Po at Valencia the ſeuen and twentieth day of Aprill; by reaſon whereof the Imperials abandoned the borough of Baſignana, and the pariſh of Caira. From thence Monſieur Saint Pol ſent Guido Rangon with a part of the armie to Mortara, a place ſtrong for the double ditches, flankes & waters: and as they had planted by night their artilleries, without prouiſion of gabions, without trenches, and other like preparations, they were before day charged by thoſe within, which did them great domage, and cloyed two peeces of artillerie, with danger to loſe them all: and it was imputed as a fault to Guido, although he was ſomewhat ill diſpoſed, that he was not preſent in perſon when they were planted. There was at that time ill prouiſions within Millan, and thoſe of the French and Venetians were no whit better, who complaining one of another, made no prouiſion at all: in ſo much, as among other difficulties, the Confederates fell into ſome doubt, doubt, that the Duke of Millan, for the litle hope he ſaw remaining to recouer that State, with his or their forces and ſuccours, would make ſome accord with the Imperials, by the meanes of Moron. But the thoughts of the French king tended altogether to peace, for a diſtruſt he had not to be able otherwiſe to recouer his children: and the Emperour being alſo inclined thereunto, two Gentlemen whom the Ladie Margaret had ſent vnto him for that effect, were returned from Spaine, bringing to her ample commiſſion to go through with the peace: whereof when the French king was aduertiſed by a Secretarie of his, whom for that cauſe he had ſent into Flanders, he required the Confederates to ſend commiſſions on their part alſo: and hauing determined in himſelfe to leaue off all prouiſions of warre (ſeeking notwithſtanding to haue ſome iuſt colour) he complained that the Venetians refuſed to contribute the money for his paſſage. For albeit at the firſt they had earneſtly ſolicited, if the Emperour did come, that he alſo would paſſe into Italy, and the King had offered to do it with foure and twentie hundred Lances, a thouſand light horſemen, and twentie thouſand footmen, in caſe the Confederates would giue him money to pay a thouſand light horſemen and twentie thouſand footmen beſides theſe, and that they would contribute to the moitie of the expenſes of the artilleries: yet afterwards, whatſoeuer the occaſion was, they withdrew themſelues.

All the Princes bent to peace

At this time Monſieur Saint Pol with foure cannons tooke Saint Angelo by force, wherein was a garriſon of foure hundred footmen: and then he turned to Saint Colombano, to open paſſage of victuals to Plaiſance, and had it by compoſition. Afterwards vnderſtanding that there were foure hundred footmen within Millan, but very ſicke, he thought to aſſault it. The ſecond day of May Mortara rendred to Monſieur Saint Pol at diſcretion, but it was after it had bene ſo battered, that it could no longer make defence: and Torniello leauing the towne of Nouaro, but not the Caſtle, wherein he put a very ſlender ſtrength of footmen, he retired to Millan: ſo that the Imperials held no other peece beyond the riuer of Theſin then Gaya and the Rocke of Biagraſſa; Monſieur Saint Pol hauing alſo gotten the Rocke of Vigeuena. The tenth day he marched to the bridge of Loca, to ioyne with the Venetians at the borough of Saint Martin. After this the Duke of Vrbin came to the armie, and coming to ſpeake together with Belgioioſo, they reſolued in common counſell to incampe before Millan with two armies on two ſides; for which expedition Monſieur Saint Pol paſſing ouer Theſin, ſhould turne to Biagraſſa to force it, and the ſame day the Venetians ſhould go to the borough of Saint Martin, which is within fiue miles of Millan, the Venetians aſſuring that they had twelue thouſand footmen, and Monſieur Saint Pol eight thouſand, to whom were to be ioyned the footmen of the Duke of Millan. Monſieur Saint Pol therefore paſſed the riuer of Theſin, and finding the towne of Biagraſſa abandoned, he had the Caſtle by accord: and after incamping at Gazano, about eight miles from Millan, he conferred againe the third day of Iune with the Duke of Vrbin at Binaſquo: in which place being certified that the Venetians had not the one halfe of twelue thouſand footmen, whereunto they were bound by the capitulations of the contract, and Monſieur Saint Pol complained greatly thereof, it was determined to approch Millan with one campe onely, on the ſide of Lazaretto, notwithſtanding Count Guido alleaged, that Anthonie de Leua, who held no more then Millan and Coma, was wont to ſay, that Millan could not be forced but with two campes. But not many dayes after, changing counſell, the Chieftaines of both the armies being aſſembled within Loda, the Dukes of Millan and Vrbin notwithſtanding they had ſolicited before to haue the campe go to Millan, and diſſwaded the expedition of Genes, aduiſed the contrary, the Duke of Vrbin alleaging many reaſons for this new deliberation; but principally for that ſeeing the Emperour made preparation to paſſe into Italy (for whoſe conduct Andrew Dore was departed from Genes with his gallies the eight day of Iune,) and that it was knowne that in Germanie there was intention to ſend new companies of Lanceknights into Italy vnder Captaine Felix, he knew not whether it were better to take Millan, or not to take it. Theſe were the reaſons alleaged by him; but it was beleeued, that for an opinion he had of the peace which was negociated in Flanders, he had ſignified to the Senate of Venice, that it was a matter vnprofitable to put themſelues in expenſes for the recouery of Millan. The ſumme of his counſell was, that the regiments of the Venetians ſhould tarry at Caſſiano, thoſe of the Duke of Millan at Pauie, and Monſieur Saint Pol at Biagraſſa, by the ſeruice of the horſemen, to ſtop victuals from entring into Millan, where it was ſuppoſed they would ſoone fall into want of food, for that the moſt part of the countrey thereabout was not ſowed. Monſieur Saint Pol could not turne him from this opinion, opinion, neither did he like that he ſhould ſtay with his armie at Biagraſſa, alleaging, that to famiſh Millan, it was enough that the Venetian regiments remained at Monce, and the bands of the Duke of Millan at Pauie and Vigeuena; and that the King preſſed him, in caſe they went not to incampe before Millan, to execute the enterpriſe of Genes, which he purpoſed to attempt with great celeritie, hoping that in the abſence of Andrew Dore, Ceſar Fregoſo to whom the French king had accorded that he ſhould be Gouernor thereof and not his father, wold cauſe it to reuolt with a ſmal ſtrength of footmen. Which proceedings, together with the information how much the armie of the Confederates was diminiſhed in footmen, had ſo aſſured Anthonie de Leua of the danger of Millan, that he ſent out Philip Torniello with a few horſemen, and three hundred footmen to recouer Nouaro, whileſt the French men and the Venetians were betweene Theſin and Millan: who being entred by the Caſtle which was holden by the Imperials, he recouered Nouaro, and afterwards iſſued out with his forces to ſpoile and get victuals. But it happened that the Captaine of Nouaro being iſſued out of the Caſtle, and walking through the towne, two ſouldiers of the Duke of Millan and three of the inhabitants of Nouaro that were priſoners in the Caſtle, when they had ſlaine him (with the aide of ſome that wrought in the Caſtle) and taken priſoners certaine Spaniards, they made themſelues Lords of the place, hoping to be ſuccoured by their friends, for that the Duke of Millan as ſoone as he vnderſtood that Torniello was gone from Millan, being fearfull of Nouaro, had diſpatched into thoſe quarters his brother Iohn Paul with a good number of horſemen and footmen, who was already arriued at Vigeuena. But when Torniello vnderſtood what had happened to the Caſtle, he returned preſently to Nouaro, where as well with threats as with preparations to giue the aſſault, he ſo aſtoniſhed the ſouldiers of the Duke of Millan, that compounding onely for the ſafetie of their perſons, they rendred the Caſtle without taking any care for the inhabitants of Nouaro that were with them. It was determined therefore to vexe Millan as much as might be, with the forces of the Venetians and the regiments of the Duke of Millan, notwithſtanding the Duke of Vrbin alleaged, that becauſe he would be more neare the lands of the Venetians, he would not abide at Monce, but at Caſciano: and Monſieur Saint Pol, who lay incamped at the Abbey of Biboldone, determined to returne beyond Po to draw towards Genes. According to which reſolution he went and incamped at Landriano, which is twelue miles from Millan, betweene the wayes of Loda and Pauie: and purpoſing the day following, which was the one and twentieth of Iune, to incampe at Lardirago vpon the way of Pauie, he ſent before the artilleries, the cariage and the auantguard, and departed himſelfe ſomewhat later with the battell and the reareguard. But Anthonie de Leua being aduertiſed by his eſpials, where he ſtayed, and that the auantguard was gone before, he iſſued out of Millan in the night, all his ſouldiers hauing for their vppermoſt garments white ſhirts: but touching himſelfe, becauſe his bodie had now bene troubled with griefes, he was armed in a chaire borne by foure men: and being arriued within two miles of Landriano without ſound of drumme, he vnderſtood by his eſpials that Monſieur Saint Pol was not yet departed from Landriano: for, which cauſe haſtening his pace, he aſſailed them before they were aware of his coming, the firſt eſquadron of the French commanded by Iohn Thomas de Gallere being already ſo farre aduanced, that it could not come in time to ſuccour the reſidue: and albeit Monſieur Saint Pol hoping much in fiue and twentie hundred Lanceknights, being deſcended on foote fought valiantly, yet when they had maintained a light defence, they began to retire: but they were ſuſtained by Iohn Ieronimo de Caſtillion and Claudius Rangon, Commanders ouer 2000 Italians, who fought maruellouſly: neuertheleſſe in the end both the horſemen and Lanceknights turning their backes, the Italians did the like; and Monſieur Saint Pol being remounted vpon his horſe, was taken as he would haue paſſed ouer a great ditch; and there remained priſoners with him Iohn Ieronimo de Caſtillion, Claudius Rangon, Lignacke, Garbone, with other Leaders of importance. The footmen were ouerthrowne, and many horſemen taken, and the baggage of almoſt all the armie, together with all the artilleries. Almoſt all the men at armes ſaued themſelues, and the Count Guido with the auantguard retired into Pauie, and from thence in the beginning of the night to Loda, ſo aſtoniſhed, that they were at the point to breake of themſelues. The Captaines excuſed themſelues, for that their companies were not payed, of whom the French bands returned all into France.

Monſieur Saint Pol priſoner to Anthinie de Leua.

Thus armes being layed aſide almoſt through all Italy, by reaſon of the ill ſucceſſe of the French men, the cogitations of the greateſt Princes were diſpoſed to accord: and the firſt that ſucceeded,

ſucceeded was that betweene the Pope and the Emperour, which was concluded at Barſelona, to the great aduantage of the Pope; either for that the Emperour hauing a great deſire to paſſe into Italy, ſought to take away all impediments, accounting it neceſſary in that regard to haue the Popes amitie; or elſe for that he would with very large and ample capitulations giue him the greater cauſe to forget the wrongs and offences which he had receiued of his officers and his armie. It was therefore accorded: That betweene the Pope and the Emperour ſhould be a perpetuall peace and confederation: That the Pope ſhould giue paſſage to the Emperours armie through the dominions of the Church, in caſe it ſhould depart out of the kingdome of Naples: That the Emperour in reſpect of the new mariage, and for the tranquillitie of Italy, ſhould reſtore the ſonne of Laurence de Medicis to the ſame eſtate of greatneſſe in Florence which his predeceſſors had before they were expulſed, hauing regard notwithſtanding to the expences that were to be defrayed for the ſaid reſtitution, according to the arbitration to be made as well by him as the Pope: That the Emperour ſhould endeuour as ſoone as he could, either by armes, or ſome other more conuenient way, to reeſtabliſh the Pope in the poſſeſſion of Ceruia, Rauenna, Modena, Reggio, and Rubiera, without preiudice to the rights of the Empire, and the Sea Apoſtolike: That the Pope hauing recouered the aforeſaid townes, ſhould accord to the Emperour the inueſtiture of the Realme of Naples in remuneration of that benefice, and ſhould reduce the tribute of the laſt inueſtiture to a white horſe, for acknowledgement of fealtie: and ſhould accord to him the nomination of foure and twentie Cathedrall Churches, for the which they were at difference, the diſpoſition of the Churches which ſhould not be in patronage, and other benefices remaining to the Pope: That when the Emperour ſhould be paſſed into Italy, the Pope and he ſhould meet and commune together, to conſult of the tranquillitie of Italy, and the vniuerſall peace of Chriſtendome, receiuing one another with ceremonies and honours due and accuſtomed: That the Emperour, in caſe the Pope ſhould require his aide to conquer Ferrara, as Aduocate, Protector, and eldeſt ſonne of the Sea Apoſtolike, he ſhould aſſiſt him euen to the end, with all the meanes which at that time ſhould be in his power: and that they ſhould agree together of the expences, maner and forme to be vſed therein, according to the qualitie of times and accidents: That the Pope and the Emperour with a common conſent ſhould deuiſe ſome meanes that the cauſe of Francis Sforce might be examined according to equitie, by Iudges not ſuſpected, to the end he might be reſtored if he were found innocent: and otherwiſe the Emperour offered (notwithſtanding the diſpoſing of the Duchie of Millan appertained to him) to diſpoſe thereof with the counſell and conſent of the Pope, and to inueſt in it no perſon which ſhould not be agreeable to him, nor to diſpoſe any otherwiſe of it, then ſhould ſeeme to him moſt expedient for the tranquillitie of Italy: That the Emperour ſhould promiſe to cauſe Ferdinand King of Hungaria his brother to conſent, that for the time of the Popes life and two yeares after, the Duchie of Millan ſhould be furniſhed of ſalts from Ceruia, according to the confederation made betweene the Emperour and Pope Leo, confirmed in the laſt inueſtiture of the Realme of Naples; not approuing neuertheleſſe the couenant that had bin made with the French king, and without preiudice to the rights of the Empire and the King of Hungaria: That neither of them, to the preiudice of this confederation, ſhould make, touching matters of Italy, any new leagues, nor obſerue ſuch as were made contrary to this: and yet that the Venetians might enter thereinto, leauing all that they poſſeſſed in the Realme of Naples, and accompliſhing all their obligations to the Emperour, and to Ferdinand, by the laſt confederation made betweene them, and in reſtoring Rauenna and Ceruia, reſeruing the actions touching the domages and intereſts ſuffered in regard of theſe matters: That the Emperour and Ferdinand ſhould vſe all their endeuour that the Heretikes may be brought home to the right way, and that the Pope ſhould vſe ſpirituall remedies; and in caſe they ſhould ſtand obſtinate, the Emperour and Ferdinand ſhould force them by armes, and the Pope would cauſe other Chriſtian Princes to aſſiſt them according to their ſeuerall meanes: That the Pope and the Emperour ſhould not receiue into protection the ſubiects, vaſſals, and feodatories one of another, ſauing in regard of the direct iuriſdiction which they had ouer any one, without extending any further: and that all protections taken in other ſorme, ſhould be interpreted voide within one moneth: That to make this amitie and coniunction more firme and ſtable, they were to confirme it with ſtrait affinitie, the Emperour promiſing to giue for wife Margaret his baſtard daughter with a dowrie of twentie thouſand ducats of yearely reuenue to Alexander de Medicis ſonne to Laurence late Duke of Vrbin, on whom the Pope determined to conferre the temporall greatneſſe of his houſe, for that at ſuch time as he was in danger of death, he had created Cardinall, Hippolito the ſonne of Iulian. They contracted alſo at the ſame time in articles ſeparate: That the Pope ſhould accord to the Emperour and his brother to reſiſt the Turke, the fourth part of the reuenues of benefices Eccleſiaſtike, in the ſame maner that his predeceſſor Adrian had done: That the Pope ſhould giue abſolution to all thoſe within Rome and other places who had offended againſt the Sea Apoſtolike, and to all ſuch as had giuen aide, counſell or fauour, yea that had participated by approbation or conſent to the actions that had bin done againſt that Sea: That whereas the Emperour had not publiſhed the Croiſado granted by the Pope, which was leſſe ample then others that had bin granted before, the Pope (the firſt being reuoked) ſhould grant another in full and ample forme, according to the ſcope of thoſe that had bin granted by the late Popes Iulio and Leo. Before this accord was paſſed, all the difficulties being now reſolued, aduertiſement came to the Emperour of the ouerthrow of Monſieur Saint Pol: and albeit it was doubted, that to helpe his conditions, he would haue changed ſome of thoſe things that were agreed vpon, yet he confirmed them all very readily, ratifying them the ſame day, which was the nine and twentieth of Iune, with ſolemne oath before the high Altar of the Cathedrall Church of Barſelona.

Peace betweene the Emperour and the French king negociated in Cambray.

But the negociations of peace betweene the Emperour and the French king were purſued with no leſſe feruencie; for the which after the commiſſions were come the towne of Cambray was appointed; a place fatall for great concluſions, in which towne were to meet together, the Lady Margaret of Auſtria, and the Lady Regent mother to the French king. In the meane while the French king laboured with all his skill and diligence (though he meant not in himſelfe to performe it) which alſo he confirmed by promiſes to the Confederate Embaſſadours in Italy (hauing therein the conſent of the King of England) not to make any accord with the Emperour without their conſent and ſatisfaction: and laboured to perſwade them not to hope in the peace, but rather to vſe diligence in the prouiſions of warre. Of which matters treating continually, he had ſent into Italy the Biſhop of Turbes with commiſſion to go to Venice, to the Dukes of Millan, Ferrara and Florence, to ſolicite things appertaining to warre, and to promiſe that if the Emperour paſſed into Italy, the King would alſo paſſe thither at the ſame time with a mightie army, ſo farre forth as the other Confederates would contribute for their part to the needfull preparations: and yet the negociation of accord dayly continued; by reaſon whereof the ſeuenth day of Iuly both the Ladies made their entries into Cambray by ſeuerall gates with great pompe, and being lodged in two houſes neare adioyning, which had entry one into the other, they ſpake together the ſame day, and gaue order to their Agents to treate of the articles: the King becauſe he would be neare at hand to reſolue all difficulties occurring, being gone vp to Compiegni, to whom the Venetians being feareful of the iſſue of that coniunction, had made many large and great offers. And there were preſent at Cambray not onely the two Ladies, but alſo the Biſhop of London and the Duke of Suffolke for the King of England, becauſe theſe things were not done without the conſent and participation of that King. The Pope ſent thither the Archbiſhop of Capua: and there were the Embaſſadours of the Confederates: but the French men made vnto them relation of things far otherwiſe then was the truth of that which was debated: there being in the King either ſo great impietie, or elſe ſo particular a regard to his owne intereſt, which conſiſted wholly in the recouery of his children, that the Florentines making great inſtance vnto him, that following the example of that which King Lewis his father in law and his predeceſſor had done in the yeare a thouſand fiue hundred and twelue, he would conſent that they might accord with the Emperour for their ſafetie, he refuſed it, promiſing them that he would neuer make any accord without comprehending them therein, and aſſuring them alſo that he was very ready to follow the warre, as likewiſe in the greateſt heate of the ſolicitation he promiſed continually to all the reſidue. The three & twentieth of Iuly there came aduertiſement of the capitulations made betweene the Pope and the Emperour, and the preſent buſineſſe being well aduanced, it was ſo troubled by reaſon of ſome difficulties touching certaine townes of Franche Comté, that the Lady Regent prepared her ſelfe to depart: but by the meanes of the Popes Legate, and principally of the Archbiſhop of Capua, the concluſion was eſtabliſhed: and although it was already concluded, the French king forbare not to promiſe to the Confederates the ſame things he had promiſed before. At laſt, being the fift day of Auguſt, the peace was solemnely published in the great Church of Cambray, whereof the first article was: That the Kings sonnes should be deliuered, the King paying to the Emperour for their ransome twelue hundred thousand crownes in ready mony, and to the King of England for him two hundred thousand: That the King should render to the Emperour within sixe weekes after the ratification, all that he possessed in the Duchie of Millan: That he should leaue vnto him Asti, with resignation of the rights thereunto: That he should leaue as soone as he could Barletta, with all that he held in the Realme of Naples: That he should require of the Venetians, that according to the forme of the capitulations of Cognac, they should render the townes of Pouille: and in case they did it not, that he should declare himselfe their enemy, and aide the Emperor for the recouery thereof with a monethly contribution of thirtie thousand crownes, and with twelue gallies, foure ships, and foure gallions payed for sixe moneths: That he should restore as many of the gallies taken at Portofino as were in his power, or pay the value thereof, that being defalked which had bin taken since by Andrea Doria or other Captaines of the Emperour: That according to that which had bin formerly couenanted at Madril, he should renounce the soueraignty of Flanders and Artois, and resigne the rights of Tournay and Arras: That he should disanull the processe of Bourbon, and render honour to the dead, and the goods to his heires: and yet the Emperour complained afterwards, that as soone as the King had recouered his children, he tooke those goods from them: That the goods of whomsoeuer that were taken in the warre, should be restored to them or their successors: which also gaue occasion to the Emperour to complaine, for that the King restored not the goods of the Prince of Orange: That all letters of defiance should be suppressed and cancelled, and chiefly that of Robert de la Marche. The Pope was comprehended in this peace as principall, and the Duke of Sauoy was included generally as subiect to the Empire, and specially as named by the Emperour: and it was set downe, that the King should meddle no more in the affaires of Italy nor of Germanie, in fauour of any Potentate to the preiudice of the Emperour, although the French King maintained afterwards that he was not prohibited by this peace to recouer that which the Duke of Sauoy vsurped of the Realme of Fraise, and which he pretended to appertaine vnto him by reason of the rights of the Ladie Regent his mother. There was also one article which bare, that in the peace it was meant, that the Venetians and the Florentines should be comprehended, so that within foure moneths they accorded all their differences with the Emperour, which was as it were a secret exclusion: and the like of the Duke of Ferrara: but touching the Barons and exiles of the Realme of Naples, there was no mention made of them. The accord being finished, the French king went immediatly to Cambray to visite the Lady Margaret: and yet being not altogether without shame for so foule an act, he eschued for certaine dayes with sundry euasions, either to see or heare the Embassadours of the Confederates: to whom in the end hauing heard them apart, he excused himselfe by the impossibilitie otherwise to recouer his children; but that he would send the Admirall to the Emperour for their good. He gaue them also other vaine hopes, and promised the Florentines to lend them for the reliefe of their dangers which were imminent, fortie thousand duckats; which had the same successe with his other promises: and he suffered Peter Stephen Colonno, whose seruice he would vse no more, to go to their pay, (making shew that he did it for their sakes.) Whilest these things were in hand, Anthonie de Leua had recouered Biagrassa, and the Duke of Vrbin remaining at Casciano, and labouring with an infinite number of pioners to fortifie it, he counselled them of Pauie and Saint Angelo to hold good: saying, the lodging of Casciano was very apt to minister succours to Lodi and Pauie. After this Anthonie de Leua went vp to Enzagua which is three miles from Casciano, from whence he skirmished continually with the companies of the Venetians: and lastly from Enzagua to Vaury, either to ouerrunne the territories of Bargamasque, or else because the Venetians had cut the water from him.

The Emperour sendeth to the Prince of Orange to inuade the state of the Florentines.

About this time Vistarino entred into Valentia by the Castle, and ouerthrew two hundred footmen that were there: and now were arriued at Genes by sea since the moneth of Iuly two thousand Spaniards to expect the coming of the Emperour, who immediatly after he had passed the accord with the Pope, sent direction to the Prince of Orange, that at the Popes request he should assaile the estate of the Florentines with the armie: and when the Prince was come to Aquila, and mustred his companies vpon the frontiers of the kingdome, the Pope made great instance vnto him to passe further: by reason whereof he went to Rome the last of Iuly without his

his companies, to resolue with the Pope vpon the prouisions for the warre. After many practises, which were three times at the point to be broken off for the difficultie which the Pope made touching the charges: it was at the last resolued, that the Pope should deliuer to him presently thirtie thousand duckats, & within a very short time after fortie thousand more, to the end that at the Emperours expenses he might first reduce the Estate of Perousa to the obedience of the Church, by chasing out Malatesta Baillon, and afterwards assaile the Florentines, to restore into that Citie the family of the Medices; a matter which the Pope esteemed very easie, for an opinion he had, that being abandoned on all sides, they would according to the custome of their elders, rather giue way, then bring their countrey into most great and manifest danger. The Prince of Orange therefore assembled his forces, which contained three thousand Lanceknights, remaining as well of those which the Viceroy had brought out of Spaine, as of those who came out of Germanie into Italy vnder George Fronspergh, and foure thousand Italians not payed, vnder diuerse Colonels, to wit, Peter Lewis Farnese, the Count of Saint Second, Colonel Marzio, and Sarra Colonno. The Pope caused three cannons with some other peeces of artilleries to be drawne out of the Castle Saint Angelo, to furnish them therewith. After the Prince of Orange, was to follow the Marquis of Guast, with the bands of Spanish footmen that were in Pemilla. But at Florence the deliberation was farre otherwise then the Pope supposed, euery one shewing themselues resolute to stand vpon their defence: the which for that it was the cause of very notable things, I thinke it very necessary to make a particular description of the situation of the Citie.

The Emperour at Genes, whither the Princes of Italy send Embassadours to him.

Whilest these things were in preparing on all sides, the Emperour departed from Barselona, accompanied with many ships and gallies, wherein there was a thousand horsemen and nine thousand footmen: and after he had bin fifteene dayes at sea, not without perill and danger, he arriued the twelfth of August at Genes, where he had aduertisement of the accord made at Cambray: and at the same time there passed for him into Lombardie, Captaine Felix with eight thousand Lanceknights. The coming of the Emperour with such prouision astonished the minds of all Italy, being now assured that they were left in prey by the French king. Therefore the Florentines being abashed, vpon the first aduertisement that came vnto them, chose foure Embassadours of the principall men of their Citie, to congratulate his coming, and to labour to make some composition with him for their affaires. But afterwards resuming courage continually, they moderated their commissions, restraining them to debate onely of their interests, and not of the differences with the Pope: in hope that by the memory of things past, and of the small confidence which was wont to be between the Popes and the Emperors, his greatnes would be so much displeasing to the Emperour, that he would not desire that the authoritie and forces of the Estate of Florence should be adioyned to the power of the Church. The Venetians were much discontented, that the Florentines being ioynt Confederates with them, had sent Embassadours to their common enemy without communicating the matter with them: and the Duke of Ferrara complained thereof also, although following their example he dispatched Embassadours to the Emperour as well as they: and the Venetians consented that the Duke of Millan should do the like, who a long time before had entertained a secret practise with the Pope, to bring him to compound with the Emperour, for that he knew euen before the ouerthrow of Monsieur Saint Pol, that he could haue no great hope either in the French king or the Venetians.

The Emperour caused the bands of Spanish footmen which he had brought with him to be landed at Sauona, and sent them into Lombardie, to the end Anthonie de Leua might issue out strong into the field. He had made an offer to land them at Spetie, to send them into Tuscan: but the Pope had an opinion that so great forces were not necessary, especially seeing he desired (for the preseruation of the countrey) not to addresse without need so great a furie against the towne of Florence: against which State and against Malatesta Baillon, proceeding now openly, he caused the Knight Sperello to be stayed vpon the lands of the Church, who before the capitulation of Cambray, being sent with money by the French King to Malatesta who had ratified his pay and retinue, returned from thence to Perousa. He caused also to be stayed neare to Bracciano, the money sent by the Florentines to the Abbot of Farfa, who was in their pay with two hundred dred horſemen, which money they ſent vnto him to leuie a thouſand footmen: but he was preſently conſtrained to render it to him again; for that the Pope hauing appointed for Legats with the Emperour, the Cardinals Farneſe, S. Croſſe and Medicis, the Cardinall of S. Croſſe paſſing by the lands of the Abbot, he cauſed him to be ſtayed, and would not deliuer him vntill his money were reſtored. But the Florentines continued in their preparations, hauing in vaine moued the Emperour for a ſurceaſſing of armes vntill he had heard their Embaſſadours, and ſent for Don Hercules the eldeſt ſonne to the Duke of Ferrara, whom ſixe moneths before they had taken into their pay with title of Captaine generall, to come to their ſuccours with his companies, as he was bound; who though he had accepted the money that was ſent him to wage a thouſand footmen allowed for his guard when he marched, neuertheleſſe (his father preferring conſiderations of Eſtate before fidelitie) he refuſed to go thither, without reſtoring the money, and yet he ſent his bands of horſemen: by reaſon whereof the Florentines denied him their fauour for the ſecond yeare.

By the nineteenth day of Auguſt the Prince of Orange was come to Terny, and the Lanceknights to Fuligno, where the whole army was muſtered: but it was a matter ridiculous, that notwithſtanding the peace was made and publiſhed betweene the Emperour and the French king, the Biſhop of Tarba as the Kings Embaſſadour at Venice, Florence, Ferrara, and Perouſa, boaſted of the mightie prouiſions of his King made for the warre, and exhorted them to do the like. After this, the Prince of Orange with ſixe thouſand footmen as well Lanceknights as Italians, came and incamped neare to Spelle, and being come before the towne accompanied with many horſemen to view the ſituation, Iohn Vrbino, who by reaſon of his long training in the warres of Italy, held the chiefeſt place among all the Captaines of the Spaniſh infantery, was hurt in the thigh with a ſhot out of the towne, of which wound he died within few dayes after, to the great domage of the army, for that almoſt all the warre was gouerned by his direction. Afterwards the artilleries were planted before Spelle, wherein were more then fiue hundred footmen and twentie horſemen, vnder the leading of Lion Baſtion baſtard brother to Malateſta: but after the ſpending of certaine volleys of ſhot vpon a Tower which is without the Towne on the wall ſide, thoſe within (notwithſtanding Lion had giuen great hope to Malateſta to defend the Towne) yeelded immediatly, vpon condition that the towne and the inhabitants ſhould remaine at the diſcretion of the Prince, and the ſouldiers with ſuch goods as they could carry, and their liues ſaued, might depart with their ſwords onely, but not to ſerue againſt the Pope or the Emperour for the ſpace of three moneths: and yet at their going out they were almoſt all ſtripped. Iohn Baptiſta Borgueſi one of the exiles of Sienna was vehemently charged with this accord, who, hauing begun to treate with Fabio Petrucci that was in the armie, gaue perfection thereunto by the aid of the other Captains; a matter which Malateſta attributed to diſloyaltie, and many others to want of courage. When the Embaſſadours of Florence being admitted into the Emperours preſence, had firſt congratulated his coming, and endeuoured to perſwade him that their Citie was not ambitious, but thankfull for benefites receiued, and ready to pleaſure any that would protect it, they excuſed themſelues, that they were entred into league with the French king by the will of the Pope, who at that time commanded them, and that ſince that time it had bene continued by neceſſitie: proceeding no further, for that they had no other commiſſion but to declare that which was propounded vnto them; and expreſſe commandement from the Commonweale, not to open their eares to any practiſe with the Pope; to viſite his other Embaſſadours, but not the Cardinall de Medicis. Whereunto they were anſwered by the great Chancellor newly made Cardinall, That it was neceſſary they ſhould ſatisfie the Pope: and they complaining of the iniuſtice of that demand, he replied, That ſeeing their Citie was confederate with the enemies of the Emperour, and had ſent out ſouldiers againſt him, it had loſt her priuiledges, and was diuolued to the Empire, and therefore the Emperour might diſpoſe of it as he thought good. But at laſt it was told them in the name of the Emperour, that they ſhould procure ſufficient commiſſion to be ſent to compound with the Pope, and that afterwards there ſhould be conſideration had of the differences that were betweene the Pope and them, which if they were not firſt compounded, the Emperour would not commune with them of their proper intereſts. Whereupon the Florentines ſent a very large commiſſion to compound with the Emperour, but not to agree with the Pope: and the Emperour departing from Genes the thirtieth day of Auguſt, went to Plaiſance, and the Embaſſadours following his Court were not admitted into Plaiſance, for that it was vnderſtood their commiſſion was not ſuch as the Emperour had demanded. Thus things remained without accord: and the Emperour had alſo cauſed the Embaſſadours of the Duke of Ferrara to depart from his Court, whom he receiued very roughly: and yet returning afterwards with new conditions, and haply with new fauours, they were admitted. Moreouer the Emperour ſent the Count Naſſau in Embaſſage to the French king, to congratulate him for that by the new accord they had confirmed the band of affinitie, and to receiue the ratification: for the which cauſes the King alſo ſent vnto him the Admirall. The King ſent money to Ranſe de Cere, to the end that with all his companies he might retire from Powilla; and cauſed twelue gallies alſo to be rigged to go thither vnder Philip Dore againſt the Venetians, againſt whom the Emperor ſent Andrew Dore with ſeuen and thirtie gallies. Neuertheleſſe the King iudging that the recouerie of his children would be more certaine if there remained ſome difficultie in Italy to the Empetour, he gaue diuerſe hopes to the Confederates, and promiſed particularly to the Florentines to ſend money to them ſecretly by the Admirall, not for any deſire he had to ſuccour them or others, but to the end they might thereby ſhew themſelues more difficult to compound with the Emperour. In this meane while there was a continuall practiſe of accord ſolicited betweene the Emperour and the Duke of Millan, which was managed by the Pronotarie Caracciol, who went and came from Cremona to Plaiſance. But the Emperour finding it ſtrange that the Duke repoſed leſſe confidence in him then he had eſteemed; and the Duke on the other ſide being hardly brought to truſt him, there was a motion made, that till the Dukes cauſe were throughly examined, Alexandria and Pauie ſhould be put into the Popes hands: whereunto the Emperour would not conſent, for that he thought the Duke was not able to reſiſt his forces, and ſo much the rather for that Anthonie de Leua was gone to Plaiſance, who as an enemie to peace and quietneſſe, had incenſed him to the warre with many reaſons. Therefore the Emperour charged him to go on with the enterpriſe of Pauie; and his drift alſo was, that at the ſame time Captaine Felix who was come with new ſupplies of Almaines, as well footmen as horſemen, and with artilleries towards Peſquiero, and after entred vpon the lands of Breſſia, ſhould make warre on that ſide vpon the Venetians: of which expedition he had made Captaine generall the Marquis of Mantua, newly returned to the deuotion of the Emperour.

In the meane while the Pope treated of peace betweene the Emperour and the Venetians, with hope to conclude it at his coming to Bolognia. For hauing before ſolicited to meete him at Genes, they had ſithens by common conſent referred their enteruiew to Bolognia, for the conueniencie of the place; being induced to meete together, not onely by a common deſire, the better to confirme their amitie and affinitie, but alſo the Emperour by neceſſitie, ſeeing he had determined to take the Crowne of the Empire; and touching the Pope, by his great deſire to the enterpriſe of Florence: and in regard of them both, the deſire they had to giue ſome forme to the affaires of Italy, which could not be accompliſhed without accommodating the affaires of the Venetians and the Duke of Millan, and chiefly without making prouiſion againſt the imminent dangers of the Turke, who being entred into Hungarie with a puiſſant armie, came towards Auſtria to take Vienna. At which time were done no actions of conſequence betweene the Emperour and the Venetians, for that the Venetians hauing an inclination to accord with him, had giuen order (becauſe they would incenſe him no further) to retire their armie by ſea from the enterpriſe of the Caſtle of Brunduſium to Corfu, ſeeking onely to preſerue the townes which they held, and doing nothing alſo at that time in Lombardie except certaine light incurſions: and ſo being carefull onely for the guard of their townes, they had put the Duke of Vrbin into Breſſia. Touching the Almaines, they were reduced to Lunata, to the number of a thouſand horſemen and eight or ten thouſand footmen, and had reſolued together with the Marquis of Mantua to execute the enterpriſe of Cremona, where was the Duke of Millan; who ſeeing himſelfe excluded from accord with the Emperour, and that Anthonie de Leua was gone to incampe before Pauie; and that Caracciol went to Cremona to denounce warre vnto him, he contracted with the Venetians to conclude no accord with the Emperour without their conſent: who bound themſelues to miniſter vnto him for the defence of his Eſtate two thouſand footmen payed, and eight thouſand duckats a moneth, and ſent him artilleries and men to Cremona, with which ſuccours the Duke had confidence to be able to defend Cremona and Lode; for touching Pauie, it made a very ſlender reſiſtance againſt Anthonie de Leua, not onely onely for that there was not victuals sufficient for two moneths, but also becauſe Captaine Piſſinard who had the guard thereof, had not many dayes before ſent out of the towne foure companies of footmen to Saint Angelo, where Anthonie de Leua had made as though he would incampe: and for this cauſe remaining within the towne with a very few ſouldiers, and diſtruſting to be able to defend it, when he ſaw they prepared to plant the artilleries, without attending either batterie or aſſault, he rendred the towne vnder ſafetie of life and goods, as well for himſelfe as his ſouldiers. He was much blamed, for that the couetouſneſſe not to loſe the wealth and riches he had gathered together by ſo many preyes and pillages (which made him haſten to yeeld) preuailed more with him then the deſire to preſerue the glorie gotten in many braue exploits of warre, and chiefly about Pauie.

At this time the warre was hotly kindled in Tuſcan, for that the Prince of Orange hauing taken Spelle, and the Marquis of Guaſt who followed him with the Spaniſh infanterie beginning to approch neare his armie, he came to the bridge of Saint Iohn neare to Perouſa vpon Tyber, where the Spaniſh footmen ioyned with him. There were in Perouſa three thouſand footmen of the Florentines: and the Prince before he incamped at Spelle, ſent a meſſenger to Perouſa to perſwade Malateſta to obey the will of the Pope: who to draw to himſelfe the Citie of Perouſa by what meanes ſoeuer, & to the end the armie might paſſe further, made this offer to Malateſta, that if he would leaue Perouſa, he would preſerue his Eſtates and his proper goods, conſenting that he might freely go to the defence of the Florentines, and would be bound that Braccio and Sforce Baillons and other of his enemies ſhould not reenter into Perouſa: and albeit Malateſta aſſured that he would not accept any offer without the conſent of the Florentines, neuertheleſſe he gaue eare continually to the Embaſſages of the Prince, who after he had conquered Spelle ſolicited him more vehemently. Malateſta communicated all theſe things to the Florentines, being without doubt inclined to accord, for that he feared the ſucceſſe of things, and haply that the Florentines would not continue to giue him all thoſe aides and ſuccours that he deſired: and when he muſt accord, he had no hope to find better conditions then thoſe that were offered him; holding it much better, without offending the Pope, or giuing him occaſion to depriue him of the goods and places that were preſerued for him, to keepe himſelfe in the pay of the Florentines, then in defending himſelfe to put all his Eſtate in danger, and make himſelfe hatefull to his friends and all the Citie: by reaſon whereof he perſeuered ſtill to ſay, that he would not accord without their priuitie, but added, that if he defended Perouſa, the Florentines muſt of neceſſitie ſupply him with a thouſand footmen more, and turne the reſidue of their companies to make head at Orſania, a place within fiue miles of Cortona, vpon the confines of Cortona and Perouſa, which they could not do without diſfurniſhing the garriſons of all their other townes: and yet the place was ſo weake, that by neceſſitie they muſt retire at euery mouing of the enemies. He ſhewed, that in caſe he did not accord, the Prince leauing Perouſa would take his way to Florence, in which caſe it was needfull for them to leaue him within Perouſa a thouſand footmen complete, which alſo would not be ſufficient, ſince the Pope might vexe the Citie with other forces then with the Imperiall regiments: but if he did accord, that the Florentines might retire to themſelues all their bands of footmen, who ſhould be accompanied with two or three hundred choiſe men of his training; and that his eſtates and goods being left to him, and his enemies excluded from Perouſa, he might apply himſelfe to their defence with a more quiet mind. The Florentines could haue bene better contented to continue the warre at Perouſa; but diſcerning that Malateſta entertained continuall intelligence with the Prince, and knowing alſo that he had not diſcontinued to practiſe with the Pope, they ſtood in doubt leſt by the importunitie of his followers, becauſe of the domages of the Citie and of the countrey, and for feare of the enemies, and the inconſtancie of the people, he ſhould in the end giue place: and they thought it was very dangerous to put into Perouſa almoſt all the ſtrength and flower of their forces, expoſed to the perill of Malateſtaes faith, to the danger to be forced by the enemies, and to the difficultie to reuoke them againe in caſe Malateſta ſhould accord: and they conſidered alſo that the changing of Perouſa could preiudice them but litle, the friends of Malateſta remaining there ſtill, and he retaining his Caſtles and Boroughs, and Braccio and the brethren not returning thither at all; ſo that ſo long as it perſeuered in this eſtate, it could not be but the Pope would be in continuall ſuſpition therof. Vpon this doubt, taking care aboue all other things for the ſafetie of their men, and hauing no aſſured confidence in the conſtancie of Malateſta, they ſent very ſecretly the ſixt of September a man of theirs to bring away their bands of ſouldiers from Perouſa, fearing to be deceiued, if the accord went on: but being informed afterwards that they could not get away, for that the enemies were neare at hand, they ſent to Malateſta their conſent that he might compound: but it was alreadie done, for that the Prince of Orange hauing paſſed Tiber at the bridge of Saint Iohn the ninth of September, and being incamped, after a certaine light skirmiſh, the accord was concluded with Malateſta the ſame night, by the which he bound himſelfe to depart from Perouſa, with permiſſion to enioy his goods, to ſerue the Florentines as a ſouldier, and to retire their companies in ſafetie; to whom the Prince promiſed (to giue them time to retire vpon the lands of the Florentines) not to ſtirre in two dayes from the place where he lay incamped: and therefore they iſſued out of Perouſa the twelfth day, and marching with great diligence, they went the ſame day to Cortona by the way of the mountaines, long and troubleſome, but ſafe. Thus was the bodie of the warre reduced vpon the lands of the Florentines, to whom, albeit the Venetians and the Duke of Vrbin had giuen hope to ſend three thouſand footmen, which for the ſuſpition of the Princes coming into thoſe quarters, they had ſent into the State of Vrbin; yet becauſe they would not diſpleaſe the Pope, that promiſe ſorted to no effect. Onely the Venetians gaue money to the Commiſſarie of Caſtrocaro to pay two hundred footmen; and notwithſtanding the Senate of Venice and the Duke of Ferrara entertained continuall ſolicitation to compound with the Emperour, yet to the end this difficultie might cauſe him the more eaſily to condeſcend, and that they might haue the better conditions, they encouraged the Florentines to defend themſelues.

The Florentines had at that time two deſignes principally, the one, that the armie might deferre ſo long to aduance, that they might haue time to fortifie their Towne, vnder the walls whereof they looked that in the end the warre would be reduced: the other, to labour to appeaſe the Emperour, euen in according with the Pope, ſo farre forth as the forme of their libertie and gouernment popular were not changed. By reaſon whereof, their Embaſſadours not hauing as yet bene excluded, they ſent a meſſenger to the Prince of Orange, and choſe Embaſſadours to go to the Pope, making inſtance, when they ſignified vnto him the election, that he would cauſe the armie to ſurceaſſe vntill they were arriued, which he refuſed to do: and therefore the Prince being aduanced, he battered and gaue aſſault to the ſuburbes of Cortona which leade to Orſaio, in which Citie of Cortona there were ſeuen hundred footmen; and was repulſed from thence. In Aretze there was a greater ſtrength of footmen: but Anthonie Francis the Commiſſarie of Albigi being inclined to abandon it, for feare leſt the Prince hauing taken Cortona, leauing Aretze behind him, ſhould take the way of Florence, and that preuenting the companies that were with him in Aretze, the Citie being aſtoniſhed for want of their beſt defendants, ſhould accord: therefore without the publike conſent (though haply following the ſecret intention of the Gonfalonnier) he went from Aretze with all his companies, leauing onely two hundred footmen within the Caſtle: but when he was arriued at Feguina, by the counſell of Malateſta who was there, and liked well that they ſhould reduce all their forces to the defence of Florence, he ſent backe againe to Aretze a thouſand footmen, to the end it ſhould not remaine altogether abandoned. But the ſeuenteenth day, Cortona, for the defence whereof a thouſand footmen had bene ſufficient, ſeeing the Florentines tooke not ſuch order for it as they ought, rendred, notwithſtanding it was very litle preſſed by the Prince, with whom it compounded to pay him twentie thouſand duckats. The loſſe of Cortona was the cauſe that the ſouldiers that lay within Aretze, doubting of their ſufficiencie to defend it, abandoned that Citie, which the nineteenth day compounded alſo with the Prince, but with capitulations and an intention rather to gouerne themſelues in their libertie, vnder the protection of the Emperour, then to remaine any longer in the ſubiection of the Florentines, declaring the profeſſion to be falſe, which vntill this time they had made to be friends to the family of Medicis and enemies to the popular gouernment. At which time the Emperour had expreſly refuſed to giue any more audience to the Florentine Embaſſadours, vnleſſe they reſtored the houſe of Medicis: and the Prince of Orange, notwithſtanding he freely deteſted together with the Embaſſadours that were with him, the Popes couetouſneſſe and the iniquitie of that enterpriſe, had neuertheleſſe declared, that he might not deſiſt from the enterpriſe, if the familie of the Medices were not receiued: and cauſing a view to be taken of his armie, he found that he had had three hundred men at armes, fiue hundred light horſemen, fiue and twentie hundred Lanceknights very braue men, two thouſand Spaniſh footmen, and three thouſand Italians, vnder the leading of Sarra Colonno, Peter Maria Roſſa, Peter Lewis Farneſe, and John Baptiſta Sanella; with whom John Saſſatello ioyned afterwards, bringing with him the money which he had receiued before of the Florentines, whoſe pay he had accepted: and alſo Alexander Vitelli, who had three thouſand footmen. But the Prince hauing ſmall ſtore of artilleries, he deſired the Siennois to lend him ſome, who when they could not refuſe the armie of the Emperour that which they demanded, yet for their hate to the Pope, and for feare of his greatneſſe, and being diſcontented with the mutation of the gouernment of the Florentines, with whom (by reaſon of their common hatred againſt the Pope) they had had for certaine moneths a ſilent peace and intelligence, they gaue order to refurniſh him with artilleries, but with as much delay as they could. In this meane while the Pope had giuen audience to the Florentine Embaſſadours, and had anſwered them, that his intention was not to alter the libertie of the Citie: and that it was not ſo much for the iniuries he had receiued of that gouernment, and the neceſſitie to aſſure his owne eſtate, as in regard of the capitulations he had made with the Emperour, that he was conſtrained to make that enterpriſe: wherein debating now of the intereſt of his honour, he required no other thing of them, then that they would voluntarily referre themſelues into his power; which being done, he would ſhew them how much he deſired the benefite and aduancement of the common countrey: and vnderſtanding afterwards that feare increaſing at Florence, ſpecially ſince they were aduertiſed that the Emperour had refuſed to heare their Embaſſadours, they had elected new Embaſſadours to come vnto him, which he thought was done to ſubmit and accord to him that he demanded, and deſiring that the matter might be ſodainly done, to auoide the deſtruction of the countrey, he diſpatched in poſt to the armie the Archbiſhop of Capua, who paſſing by Florence, found them of the towne otherwiſe diſpoſed then the Pope was perſwaded. In this meane while the Prince of Orange aduanced, and was come the foure and twentieth day to Monte Varchi in the vale of Arno, which is within fiue and twentie miles of Florence, expecting eight cannons from Sienna, which were ſent away the day after; but being brought with the ſame ſlowneſſe wherewith they had bin prepared, they cauſed the Prince, who the ſeuen and twentieth day had brought the army to Feguine and Anciſa, to abide in that place vnto the end of the fourth day of October: and from hence proceeded the difficultie of the whole enterpriſe. For after the loſſe of Aretze, the Florentines perceiuing their hope to faile them, and the promiſes that had bene made vnto them on all ſides, and that the fortifications which were made in the Citie on that ſide towards the mountaine, notwithſtanding there was continuall labouring at it, could not, by the iudgement of ſouldiers, be made defenſible ſooner then eight or ten dayes: vnderſtanding alſo that the armie of the enemies aduanced, and that towards Bologna, Ramaſotto, who was in armes by the Popes ordinance with three thouſand footmen, had ſacked Firenſola, and was entred into the countrey of Mugello, there being ſome danger that he would go vp to Prato: the Citizens being much aſtoniſhed, began to incline to accord, chiefly for that many fled away for feare; ſo that in the Councell of the Dieci, which is ordained to conſult of the affaires of warre, in which Councell were preſent the principall Cirizens of the gouernment, they were all of opinion, that there ſhould be ſent to Rome a free and ample commiſſion, to referre themſelues to the Popes will. But when this reſolution was related to the ſupreme Magiſtrate, without whoſe conſent there could no deliberation paſſe, the Gonfalonnier, who obſtinately maintained the contrary opinion, was againſt it, and ioyning with him the Magiſtrate popular of the Colledges (who ſomewhat repreſented the authoritie of the Tribunes of the people of Rome) amongſt whom haply were many perſons of a froward mind, and of great temeritie and inſolencie; he preuailed ſo much, (his opinion being alſo ſupported with the boldneſſe and threatnings of many yong men) that he hindered that nothing was eſtabliſhed for that day: and yet it is manifeſt, that if the day following, which was the eight and twentieth of September, the Prince had aduanced and come on one remoue, thoſe that impugned the accord, could not haue reſiſted the inclination of all the reſidue; of ſo ſmall cauſes depend oftentimes the moments of right great things. The vaine ſurceaſſing then of the Prince of Orange, which ſome interpreted to be done expreſly to maintaine the warre, for that he had not ſufficient artilleries to approch the Citie of Florence, was the cauſe that many within the Towne reſumed courage: but that which imported more, was, that the fortifications being continued

without any intermission of time with a great number of men, did so aduance, that before the Prince of Orange remoued from the place where he lay incamped, the Captaines iudged that the rampiers were sufficient for defence: so that now giuing ouer all inclination to accord, the Citizens resolued to defend themselues: whereunto was also added, that Ramassotto, who had brought with him without money, not souldiers but paisants, and had taken the field, not with intention of fight, but to spoile: after he had sacked all Mugello, he retired with his bootie vpon the territories of Bolognia, where all his company dissolued, who had sold vnto him the most part of the things they had robbed. Thus of an easie warre which might haue bin ended with small losse to any, was deriued a most heauie and pernicious warre, which could not be finished vntill the whole countrey were wasted, and the Citie reduced into hazard of vtter ruine. The fift day of October the Prince of Orange departed from Feguine, but marching so slowly, to tarry for the artilleries of Sienna which approched, that he could not before the twentieth day range all his companies and artilleries into the plaine of Ripoly, which is within two miles of Florence: and all his army was not lodged vpon the litle hils neare the rampiers vntill the foure and twentieth day: of which army one part occupied all the litle hils eminent to the Citie, which stretch from the gate Saint Miniato to the gate Saint George; and the other extended from the said gate Saint Miniato to the way of the gate Saint Nicholas. There were within Florence eight thousand footmen, all men of seruice, and their resolution was to defend Prato, Pistoya, Empoly, Pisa, and Liuorne, in all which places they had put sufficient garrisons; and to leaue the other places rather to the fidelitie and discretion of the people, and to the strength of their situation, then to put great bands of souldiers to guard them. But now all the countrey was full of voluntary souldiers and robbers: and the Siennois did not onely make pillage in euery place, but also sent bands of souldiers to occupie Montpulsion, hoping that afterwards the Prince would consent that they might retaine it: but certaine footmen of the Florentines being within it, they defended it easily: and not long after, Napoleon Vrsin a souldier of the Florentines arriued there with three hundred horsemen, who would not depart from Rome before the Pope was vpon his way to Bolognia. The Prince of Orange, when he had incamped his army, and stretched it out at large vpon the litle hils of Montici, Gallo and Giramont, and hauing gotten pioners and certaine peeces of artilleries from Lucques, he caused a rampier to be made to giue an assault, as was supposed, to the bastillion of Saint Miniato: but on the other side to hinder it, were planted in the garden of Saint Miniato foure cannons vpon a Cauallier. The Townes of Colli and Saint Gimignano rendred immediatly to the Prince, and they were places of importance to make easie the resort of victuals that came from Sienna. The nine and twentieth day the Prince of Orange planted vpon the bastillion of Giramont foure cannons to beate the steeple of Saint Miniato, for that a Saker which the defendants of the towne had mounted thereupon, endomaged the army: and two of those cannons were broken within a few houres: for which cause, the day following another cannon being brought to the place, after they had shot in vaine about an hundred and fiftie bullets, and could not dismount the Saker, they forbore to shoote any more: and euery one considering that it was hard to take Florence, specially with one armie, the actions began to proceed slowly, and rather in maner of skirmishes then in forme of assault. The second day of Nouember there was a great skirmish at the bastillion of Saint George, and of Saint Nicholas, and that vpon the way that goeth to Rome: and the fourth day there was planted vpon Giramont a Culuerin against the publike Pallace, which at the first shot was opened. At this time the horsemen that were within Florence made incursions to Valdipesa, and tooke an hundred horse, the most part of seruice: and also certaine horsemen and harquebuziers of the Florentines, issuing out of Pontadere, tooke threescore horses betweene the Cabans and the Tower of Saint Romaine.

The Pope and the Emperour at Bolognia.

By this time the Pope being arriued at Bolognia, the Emperour according to the custome of great Princes came thither after him, for that when two Princes are to meete together, the maner is, that he that is of greatest dignitie presenteth himselfe first in the place appointed, and it is taken for a signe of reuerence, when he that is inferiour cometh thither vnto him. He was receiued of the Pope with great honour, and lodged in the same Pallace with him, in the midst of the house, one neare to the other, and it seemed by the demonstrations and familiarities that passed betweene them, that they had alwayes bene in great amitie and good will: and the feare was now ceassed of the inuasion by the Turkes, for that their armie, together with the

perſon of the grand Seigneur being preſented before Vienna, wherein was a great garriſon of Lanceknights, they had not onely giuen many aſſaults in vaine, but alſo had bene repulſed with great ſlaughter, ſo that diſtruſting to be able to take it, and chiefly having no great artilleries to batter it, and being conſtrained by the ſeaſon, which in that region was very ſharpe, for that it was in the moneth of October, they brake vp, not retiring into any place neare to it; but taking the way of Conſtantinople, which is a march of three moneths. The Emperour therefore finding himſelfe aſſured of that ſuſpition, which before had not onely made him inclined (notwithſtanding the conqueſt of Pauie) to accord with the Duke of Millan, but alſo had induced him to perſwade the Pope to thinke vpon ſome meanes to compound with the Florentines, to the end that being freed of the affaires of Italy, he might paſſe with all his forces into Germanie, to the ſuccours of Vienna and his brother: the Pope and he began to debate vpon the affaires of Italy; and that which the Pope tooke moſt to heart, was the enterpriſe againſt the Florentines, whereunto the Emperour alſo ſeemed to be much inclined; as well to ſatisfie the Pope in that which had bene capitulated at Barſelona, as alſo for that the Citie of Florence hauing ſerued the French againſt him in the Realme of Naples, the embaſing thereof was very pleaſing vnto him. Therefore foure Embaſſadours of the Florentines who were come to the Pope at Bologna, making inſtance againe to ſpeake to the Emperour, he would neuer giue them audience but one time, and that when it pleaſed the Pope, from whom alſo he tooke the ſubſtance of the anſwer that he made them. Thus they concluded to continue the enterpriſe; and becauſe it fell out more difficult then the Pope expected, it was determined, in caſe there happened occaſion of accord with the Venetians and Francis Sforce, that the companies that were in Lombardie ſhould be turned thither, which ſhould be payed by the Emperour, and that the Pope ſhould contribute monethly to the Prince of Orange (who came to Bologna to ſolicite theſe matters) threeſcore thouſand duckats, to the end that (the Emperour being not able to beare out ſo great expenſes) he might maintaine thoſe regiments that were already about Florence. After this, they ſpake of other intereſts of the Pope, to wit, concerning the affaires of Modena and Reggio: wherin the Pope, to auoid the note of obſtinacy, hauing ſung the ſame note he had ſung before, and often reiterated, that if the intereſt of thoſe two Townes onely were brought into queſtion, he would make no difficultie to diſpoſe of them according to the will of the Emperour, but that in alienating Modena and Reggia, Parma and Piatſance would remaine ſo ſeparate from the Eſtate Eccleſiaſtike, that in conſequence they would ſeeme in a maner alienated; the Emperour anſwered him, that it was a reaſonable reſpect: but that he could do no more then vſe his authoritie, whileſt his forces were occupied in the enterpriſe of Florence; neuertheleſs, in ſecret he would haue wiſhed, that with the good ſatisfaction of the Pope, thoſe Townes might remaine to the Duke of Ferrara, with whom as he came to Bologna he had had conference at Modena, and giuen him great hope that he would vſe all his endeuour with the Pope for his good; ſo much could that Duke by his induſtrie and great art inſinuate himſelfe into the Emperours grace and fauour, and could ſo poſſeſſe the minds of thoſe that gouerned him moſt, and he wanted not great perſonages in his Court that fauoured him. There remained now the two articles of moſt importance and difficultie, concerning the Venetians and Francis Sforce; but touching the accord with them, and chiefly with Francis Sforce, he ſhewed not himſelfe ſo blacke as he had bene before, quite contrary to the inclination with the which he was come into Italy, which hapned for that he found matters more difficult then he had imagined in Spaine, and for that he ſaw by reaſon of the new coniunction of Francis Sforce with the Venetians, that the conqueſt of the Eſtate of Millan would not be eaſie; finding himſelfe alſo imbarked into very great expences, by reaſon of ſo many ſouldiers and followers which he had brought with him, and cauſed to come after him, as well out of Spaine as Germanie: but chiefly for that his brother, by reaſon of the tumults of the Lutherans, and other ſignes appearing of innouation, ſolicited him to paſſe into Germanie, whither it was credible that within a ſhort time the Turkes would returne againe: for that it was well known that Soliman inflamed with diſdaine and ignominie, had ſworne at his departure from Vienna, that he would ſpeedily returne thither againe with farre greater forces. And for that it ſeemed to the Emperour a matter not onely vnſure, but alſo of very ſmall honour, to depart out of Italy leauing matters imperfect, he began to make ſhew that he was inclined not onely to come to accord with the Venetians, but alſo to pardon Francis Sforce: whereof the Pope made great inſtance as well for the deſire of an vniuerſall tranquillitie, as to the end that the Emperour standing no more restrained and hindered with other enterprises, all his forces might be turned against Florence. The Emperour was principally detained, in that he thought it was against his dignitie, that it should be thought that he was induced to pardon Francis Sforce almost by necessitie: and Anthonie de Leua who was with him at Bolognia, solicited him vehemently to make another resolution concerning that Estate, sometimes propounding Alexander the Popes nephew, and sometimes others. Neuertheless for that there could not easily be found out for that Estate, a personage with whom Italy would be contented, and the Pope hauing no inclination to conuert it to any of his, for that it was a matter that could not be accomplished without new warres and new troubles: the Emperour at last inclining to this opinion, consented to grant safeconduct to Francis Sforce, vnder colour to come and iustifie himselfe before him, but in effect to reduce things to some composition; and the Venetians also were well contented with his going, for that they hoped that at one and the same time there would be introduced some accord of their affaires. Yet for all this armes were not layd downe in Lombardie, for that Helgioioso, who in the absence of Anthony de Leua was chiefe Commander at Millan, went and incamped with seuen thousand footmen before Saint Angelo, wherein were foure companies of footmen of the Venetians & of the Duke of Millan: and when he had battered it, finding that the continuall raine made vnprofitable the harquebuziers that without any couert defended the wals, he brought his souldiers neare, couered with their shields, and with their swords and pikes he gaue the assault, wherein he presented his owne person valiantly: but the defendants being constrained to cast downe their matches, and to fight with other weapons, being much astonished, they began to retire and abandon the walls, so that the enemies being entred, they remained all either dead or prisoners. After this he determined to passe to the other side of Adda, and hauing passed part of his armie at the bridge made at Cassano, certaine new bands of Spaniards tooke their way towards Millan, but he preuenting them, raised vp the Citie to armes, so that when they could not enter, they returned to the army. Notwithstanding these things, and that the Lanceknights were vpon the lands of the Venetians, the negociations of peace went already so forward, that all enterprises of warre began to grow cold. For when Francis Sforce was brought to the presence of the Emperour at Bolognia, and hauing thanked him for his benignitie in that he had admitted him into his presence, he told him, that he reposed so much in his iustice, that for all matters happened before the Marquis of Vesquiere restrained him within the Castle of Millan, he desired no other suretie or supplement then his owne innocencie: and that therefore touching these things he frankly renounced the safeconduct, the descript whereof the Duke holding in his hand, he cast it at the Emperours feet: which was a matter that contented him much. There was a moneth spent in debating the difficulties as well concerning his accord, as that of the Venetians: and in the end, the Pope hauing taken great paines therein, both the one and the other were concluded the three and fourtieth day of December, Francis Sforce binding himselfe to pay to the Emperour within one yeare foure hundred thousand duckats, and fiue hundred thousand more within ten yeares, to wit fiftie thousand euery yeare, Como and the Castle of Millan remaining in the meane while in the hands of the Emperour, the which he bound himselfe to render to Francis Sforce as soone as the paiments of the first yeare were performed; and gaue him the inuestiture of the Duchie, or rather confirmed that which had bene giuen to him before. To furnish these paiments, and for the gifts promised to those that gouerned the Emperour, he made very great impositions vpon the Citie of Millan, and through the whole Duchie, notwithstanding the people had bin consumed both by such cruell and long warres, and by famine and the pestilence. Touching the Venetians, they accorded, That they should render to the Pope Rauenna and Cerua, with their territories, sauing their rights, and the Pope pardoning all such as had conspired or done anything against him: That they should restore to the Emperour by the end of the next Ianuarie, all that they possessed in the Realme of Naples, and pay him the residue of the two hundred thousand duckats due by the third article of the last peace contracted betweene them; that is to say, fiue and twentie thousand duckats within one moneth next following, and fiue and twentie thousand euery yeare after, in case that their places should be rendered to them within one yeare, if they were not rendred according to the tenor of the said peace, or else the controuersie iudged by common arbitrators: That they should pay to the exiles fiue thousand duckats for euery yeare for the reuenue of their goods, as it was ordained by the treatie

Capitulations betweene the Emperour, the Venetians and the Duke of Millan.

of the ſaid peace: That ouer and beſides this, they ſhould pay to the Emperour an hundred thouſand duckats, the one moitie within ten moneths, and the other halfe within a yeare after. Furthermore it was accorded, that the rights of the Patriarch of Aquilea, which had bene reſerued to him in the capitulation of Wormes againſt the King of Hungarie, ſhould be decided: That the Duke of Vrbin ſhould be comprehended in this peace and confederation, becauſe he was adherent and in the protection of the Venetians: That the Venetians ſhould pardon the Count Brunoro de Gambara: That traffike and commerce ſhould be free amongſt all their ſubiects; and that there ſhould be no place of retraite giuen to pirates that troubled either partie: That the Venetians ſhould enioy peaceably all that they held: That all thoſe that had bene declared rebels, for hauing adhered to Maximilian, the Emperour, and the King of Hungarie, ſince the yeare 1523, ſhould be reſtored; onely the reſtitution ſhould not extend to the goods that had bene confiſcated: That betweene the ſaid parties there ſhould not onely be peace, but alſo a perpetuall league defenſiue for their Eſtates of Italy againſt all Chriſtian Princes. The Emperour promiſed, that the Duke of Millan ſhould keepe continually in his Eſtate fiue hundred men at armes, fiue hundred light horſemen, ſixe thouſand footmen, and a good band of artilleries, for the defence of the Venetians: and the Venetians to maintaine the like ſtrength for the defence of the Duke of Millan. And it was ſet downe, that when either of their Eſtates were moleſted, the other ſhould not ſuffer victuals, munitions, poſts, or Embaſſadours of the enemie to paſſe through their countrey; and alſo ſhould hinder them from hauing any aide in their Eſtates, or paſſage for any kind of ſuccours: That if any Chriſtian Ptince, though he were of ſupreme dignitie, ſhould inuade the Realme of Naples, the Venetians ſhould be bound to helpe to defend it with fifteene light gallies well armed: That in this preſent accord ſhould be comprehended all ſuch as thoſe afore named, and to be named, held in their protection, the Venetians notwithſtanding being no otherwiſe bound to their defence: That if the Duke of Ferrara accorded with the Pope and the Emperour, he was vnderſtood to be comprehended in this confederation. For the execution of which accords the Emperour rendred to Francis Sforce Millan and all the Duchie, and reuoked all the ſouldiers, except ſuch as were neceſſary for the guard of the Caſtle and of Coma, which places he rendred afterwards according to the time couenanted: and the Venetians reſtored to the Pope the Townes of Romagnia; and to the Emperour thoſe which they held in Powilla.

THE XX. BOOKE OF THE hiſtorie and diſcourſe of Guicciardin.

The Argvment.

THe Emperour taketh the Imperiall Crowne at Bologna, and from thence paſſeth into Almanie. The family of Medicis by the aide of the Emperours armie returne to Florence. Ferdinand is choſen king of Romaines. The Pope will not hearken to a Councell. The French King ſtirreth vp the Turke againſt the Emperour, and hath conference with the Pope at Marſeilles.

BY the peace and confederation aboue rehearſed an end being put to ſo long and troubleſome a warre, which had continued for the ſpace of more then eight yeares, with ſo many horrible accidents, all Italie remained free from tumults and dangers of warre, except the Citie of Florence, whoſe warres had bene helping to the peace of others; and of the contrary, the tranquillitie of others cauſed to her a worſe and more dangerous warre. For when the difficulties that were debated, were in ſuch ſort digeſted, that there was now no further doubt but the accord would come to perfection, the Emperour hauing brought his companies out of the Eſtate of the Venetians, he ſent foure thouſand Lance-knights, fiue and twentie hundred Spaniſh footmen, eight hundred Italians, and more then three hundred light horſemen, with fiue and twentie peeces of artilleries to the warre againſt the Florentines, wherein were performed very few enterpriſes, and thoſe ſcarce worthy to be written, thoſe without hauing not the hearts to inuade the towne, and thoſe within hauing no deuotion to aſſay fortune; for that iudging they had meanes to defend themſelues for many moneths, they hoped that either for want of money, or by ſome other accidents, the enemies would not ſtay long there. Neuertheleſſe the Prince of Orange had ſent fifteene hundred footmen, and foure hundred horſemen with foure peeces of artilleries to take Laſtra, wherein were three En-Laſtra taken. ſignes of footmen, and before the reſcues of Florence could arriue, they tooke it, and ſlue about two hundred of the footmen. It happened that in the night of the eleuenth day of December, Stephen Colonno with a thouſand harquebuziers, and foure hundred halberdiers and partiſans, all Camiſado. in corſlets and Camiſado after the maner of Spaine, aſſailed the regiment of Sarra Colonno, who were lodged in the houſes neare the Church of Saint Margaret de Montici, and there they ſlue and wounded many men without the loſſe of one onely perſon. About that time were ſlaine with a bullet within the garden of Saint Miniato, Mario Vrſin and Iulio Saint Croſſe: and Pirrhus going from the Borough of Peter to take Montopoli, which is a towne in the countrey of Piſa, the footmen what were within Empoly ſtopped his paſſage betweene Palaia and Montopoly, and ouerthrew him, taking many priſoners. Moreouer, the Florentines ſent to the Borough of Saint Sepulchro, Napoleon Vrſin with an hundred and fiftie horſemen, for that Alexander Vitelli went ſpoiling the countrey towards the ſaid Borough and Anguiari. But when the regiments newly ſent by the Emperour were paſſed the Alpes, Piſtoya and afterwards Prato, abandoned of the Florentine companies, yeelded to the Pope: by reaſon whereof, the armie that had left behind them no impediment, marched not to ioyne with the others, but remaining on the other ſide of Arno, they incamped at Peretola neare the walls of the Citie, vnder the gouernement of the Marquis of Guaſt, the Prince of Orange neuertheleſſe remaining ſuperiour of all: and things were reduced rather to the forme of a ſiege, then of an aſſault. At this time Pietraſanta rendred to the Pope. In the end of this yeare, the Pope at the requeſt of Malateſta

Baillon

Baillon who gaue him hope of accord, ſent to Florence directly to him, Rodolfo Pio Biſhop of Faenza, with whom were debated diuerſe matters, ſome with the priuitie of the Citie, and for the profit thereof, and ſome ſecretly by Malateſta againſt the Citie; which notwithſtanding ſorted not to effect: yea it was beleeued that Malateſta, who was now come to the expiration of his pay, had cunningly entertained them, to the end that the Florentines, fearing to be abandoned of him, might retaine him againe into their pay with title of Generall, the which he obtained.

This enterpriſe of Florence continued alſo the yeare 1530: and albeit the Prince of Orange in that he began to make new caualliers and caſt new trenches, made demonſtration that he would batter the baſtillions as neare as he could, but chiefly that of Saint George, which was very ſtrong: yet partly through his ignorance, and partly through the difficultie of the action, there was not any thing put in execution, the guard of the whole Mount appertaining to Stephen Colonno. 1530.

In the beginning of this yeare, the Florentines taking hope of the matters of negociation with the Biſhop of Faenza, ſent other Embaſſadours to the Pope and the Emperour, but with expreſſe commiſſion not to hearken to any thing by the which they might go about to alter the gouernment or diminiſh the demaine: ſo that being diſcordant in the principall article, and alſo hauing no meanes to obtaine audience of the Emperour, they returned to Florence without any concluſion. There were within Florence nine or ten thouſand footmen, but payed in ſuch ſort that they amounted to more then foureteene thouſand payes: by reaſon whereof the ſouldiers defended the Citie with great affection and fidelitie; and to confirme them the more herein, all the Captaines being aſſembled in the Church of Saint Nicholas, when they had heard Maſſe, they took a ſolemne oath in the preſence of Malateſta to defend the Citie euen to death. In this conſtancie of the Italian footmen, onely Napoleon Vrſin ſhewed himſelfe vnconſtant, who when he had receiued money of the Florentines, returned to Bracciano, and compounded his affaires with the Pope and the Emperour, and drew from Florence certaine Captaines whom he had ſent thither. But the Pope omitting no diligence to obtaine his purpoſe, ſo wrought with the French king, that he ſent Monſieur Clermont to excuſe the accord he had made by neceſſitie to redeeme his children, alleaging that it was impoſſible to comprehend them in it, counſelling them to take ſuch conditions as they might, ſo farre forth as they were profitable and with conſeruation of their libertie, and offering as it were to interpoſe in the action. He commanded alſo Malateſta and Stephen Colonno as the Kings men, to depart from Florence, notwithſtanding apart he ſecretly told them the contrary. But that which moſt diminiſhed his reputation and aſtoniſhed the people, was, that to ſatisfie the Pope and the Emperour, he reuoked his ordinary Embaſſadour Monſieur de Vigny, who was ordinarily reſident at Florence, leauing there notwithſtanding as a priuate perſon Emilio Ferreto, that they might not vtterly deſpaire, and promiſing them ſecretly to aide them as ſoone as he had recouered his children: and he was at the point to diſmiſſe the Florentine Embaſſadour from his Court; for that the Pope vſing all deuices and ſubtilties, ſent by the Biſhop of Tarbes the Cardinals Hat to the Chancellor, and not long after the legation of the Realme of France, by whom he ſolicited a new enteruiew at Thurin betweene the Emperour, the French king, and himſelfe; but the Biſhop of Tarbes was anſwered in the Kings Councell, That the Kings children being captiue, it were a fooliſh thing for the King alſo to ſeeke a priſon.

Then the Pope and the Emperour determined to go to Sienna, by their neareneſſe to countenance the enterpriſe, and afterwards to draw to Rome for the coronation of the Emperour: but as they were vpon the point to depart, (whether it were a true or feigned deliberation) the Emperour receiued letters out of Germanie, ſoliciting him to returne thither with ſpeed, the Electors and the Princes vrging the ſame in regard of the Diots; Ferdinand, to be choſen King of Romanes; and others in regard of the Councell. Therefore omitting all thoughts to paſſe further, the Emperour tooke the Imperiall Crowne in Bolognia on the feſtiuall day of Saint Matthias, with great affluence of people, but with ſmall pompe and expenſes: a day very happie vnto him, for that on that day he was borne, on that day the French king became his priſoner, and on that day he tooke the Enſignes and ornaments of the Imperiall dignitie. Neuertheleſſe before he departed, he laboured to accord the Pope and the Duke of Ferrara, who the ſeuenth day of March came to Bolognia vnder ſafe conduct: and when there was no other iſſue found for

for this controuerſie, they referred the arbitration of all their controuerſies as wel of right as of fact to the perſon of the Emperor, the Pope being induced thereunto by the generalitie of the Compromiſe, which was ſuch as contained alſo the quarrell of Ferrara, whereof the Pope not doubting but according to the terms of right it wold diuolue to the Sea Apoſtolike, he thought the Emperor had an eaſie means by vſing ſilence touching Ferrara, to cauſe Modena and Reggio to be rendred vnto him: and alſo the Emperour promiſed him, that if he found that he had right to thoſe two Cities, he would pronounce iudgement, but if he found it otherwiſe, he would ſuffer the Compromiſe to expire: and for aſſurance of the obſeruation of that which ſhould be determined, they couenanted, that the Duke ſhould diſpoſe Modena into the hands of the Emperour, at whoſe inſtance he had before reuoked his Embaſſadours from Florence, and ſent pioners to the armie. The Emperour departed from Bologna the two and twentieth day, the Pope hauing told him, that his intention was to conſent to the Councell, if he thought it might any way auaile for the extirpation of the hereſie of the Lutherans: and with him went for Legat the Cardinal Campeius: and being arriued at Mantua, when he had receiued threeſcore thouſand duckats from the Duke of Ferrara, he gaue to him the towne of Carpy in fealtie for euer: and the one and thirtieth day the Pope tooke his way to Rome, the matters of Florence remaining in the ſame difficultie. The Imperials made many ſignes as though they would aſſault the Citie, and for that cauſe they had begun a trench before the baſtillion of Saint George, where an hote skirmiſh being performed the one and twentieth day of March, they without receiued great harmes. The fiue and twentieth day the Prince of Orange battered the Tower adioyning to the ſide of the Baſtillion of Saint George towards the gate of Rome, becauſe it did the armie much harme, but finding it very ſtrong, after certaine volleys of cannon ſhot, he ceaſſed the battery: and new companies dayly arriuing, for that there were no other warres in Italy, the harmes and ruines of the countrey of Florence increaſed continually. Volterra was rendred to the Pope, but the Caſtle holding good for the Florentines, it was battered in the name of the Imperials with two Cannons and three Culuerins brought from Genes: and the Florentines deſiring to ſuccour it, ſent to Empoly an hundred and fiftie horſemen and fiue Enſignes of footmen, who going forth by night, paſſed by the campe neare Mount Oliuet, and being diſcouered, certaine horſemen were ſent out after them, who ouertooke them, but being bickered withall by the harquebuziers, they retired with ſome loſſe: and the horſemen that were iſſued out of Florence by another way behind the campe arriued at the ſame time with the footmen within Empoly in ſafetie, where they were receiued by Francis Ferruccio Gouernor of that place, who being ſent in the beginning of the warre by the Florentines to Empoly as commander ouer a very ſmall companie of horſemen, and with very litle authoritie, had, during the warre, by the oportunitie of that ſeate, and the occaſion of preys and ordinary incurſions, gotten together a good number of choiſe ſoldiers, with whō as wel by his valor as for his liberalitie, hauing gotten great reputation, the Florentines had no ſmall expectation of him. Ferruccio then departed from Empoly with two thouſand footmen and fiue hundred horſe, and marching with great celeritie, he entred into the Caſtle of Volterra the ſixe and twentieth day of Aprill three houres before night, where hauing refreſhed his ſouldiers, he preſently aſſaulted the Towne which was guarded by Iohn Baptiſta Borgueſo with a very few footmen, and tooke two trenches before night, ſo that the next morning the Towne rendred vnto him, and he got the artilleries that were come from Genes. Preſently after this he ſet himſelfe to draw money by many exactions from the inhabitants of Volterra, and continually increaſing the number of his ſouldiers, he cauſed S. Gimignano and Colle to reuolt, and cutting off the victuals that came from Sienna by that way, had reduced the armie into great difficulties, whoſe Captaines thinking of no other thing then the ſiege, the Marquis of Guaſt retired the artilleries into Prato. But Captaine Maramus coming in good time into thoſe quarters vnlooked for, with fiue and twentie hundred footmen without pay; which was a ſuccour that came againſt the Popes will (ſo incertaine are the affaires of war) he reſtrained his fury, for that Maramus went and incamped with his companies at the ſuburbes of Volterra. The ninth day of May there was a great skirmiſh without Rome gate, and there were of thoſe within an hundred and thirtie ſlaine and wounded, and of thoſe without more then two hundred, amongſt whom was Captaine Baragnino a Spaniard. The Florentines hoped ſtill for ſome ſuccours from the French king, who continued to promiſe them great ſuccours when he ſhould haue recouered his children: and to entertaine them in the meane while in this hope,

he gaue assignation to the Florentine Merchants for twentie thousand duckats, which were due to them long time before, to the end they might lend it to the Citie: which was brought to Pisa by Lewis Alaman, but at sundry times, so that it profited litle: Moreouer Iohn Paul de Cere whom the Florentines had taken into their pay for the guard of Pisa, came thither at the same time. But the conquest of Volterra bred a far greater detriment to the Florentines: for that Ferruccio, contrary to the commission giuen him, that he might go the stronger to Volterra, and for that he was too confident of the Castle of Empoly, had left within it so small a garrison, that the Imperials being encouraged thereby, and purposing to vse the occasion, went and incamped there vnder the Maquis of Guast, and with small domage tooke it, and sacked it: the losse of which place afflicted the Florentines more then any other thing that happened during that war, for that hauing determined to assemble in that place new regiments, they hoped by the oportunitie of the situation thereof, which was of great importance, to reduce into great difficulties the army that lay on that side of Arno, and to open the way for victuals to the Citie, which began already to be in want: and hereunto was added a new occasion to depriue them also of the hopes they had conceiued. For after the French king had in the beginning of Iune, deliuered ouer his money which he was to pay to the Emperour, and retired his children; in stead of so many aides and succours which he had alwayes said he had reserued till that time, he sent into Italy at the instance of the Pope (who to draw the Kings seruants wholly to his side, created Cardinall the Bishop of Tarbes Embassadour resident in his Court) one Peter Francis Pontresme, whom he trusted much, to practise some accord with the Florentines, who by that meanes lost all hope to be succouted by the King; seeing that he and the King of England ioyned together, did all they could so to reconcile the Pope vnto themselues, as they might hope to separate him from the Emperour: and in that regard the French King laboured to haue some participation and degree to reduce the Florentines into the Popes power. When the Marquis of Guast had taken Empoly, he went with his companies to ioyne with Mariano in the suburbes of Volterra: and hauing about sixe thousand footmen, they began to batter the Towne; and when they saw they had brought to the earth more then fortie fadomes of the wall, they gaue three assaults in vaine, with the losse of more then three hundred men. They made afterwards a new battery, and gaue a braue and furious assault with the Italians and Spaniards mingled together, but it was with greater domage then the former assaults, so that the campe brake vp. And the same morning about an houre before day, Stephen Colonno issued out of the gate of Faenza with a Camisado of three thousand footmen, and Malatesta by the posterne that leadeth to Prato, to assaile the Lanceknights that were lodged in the Monastery of Saint Donato, where they had fortified themselues. Stephen passed the trenches, and slue many of them; but the residue hauing put themselues in order in the meane while, defended themselues valiantly: and Stephen hauing receiued a light hurt in the mouth and in the virill member, he retired when he could not stay long for feare lest succours should come vnto them, complaining much that Malatesta had not followed him.

The Florentines out of hope to be succored by the French king

Now although in Florence, where there entred nothing on any side, the want of victuals increased daily, yet their obstinacie failed not: and Ferruccio being gone from Volterra to Pisa, and assembling as many footmen as he could, all the hopes of the Florentines were reduced to his coming; for that they had signified vnto him that by what way or danger soeuer, he should come vnto them, making their designe to giue battell to the enemies as soone as he was ioyned with the companies that were within Florence: of which deuice the successe was not so good, as the rashnesse of the resolution was great (if those counsels may be termed rash which are caused by a last necessitie) seeing he must passe through the enemies countrey, which was occupied by a very strong army, though dispersed into many places. The Prince of Orange who had aduertisement of this deuice, prepared to meete him with part of the army, and assembling many bands of Italian footmen; and Malatesta Baillon (with whom he had very secret intelligences) haply hauing secretly assured him, as the Florentines suspected, that in his absence he would not assaile the army, he went out to encounter him; and finding him neere to Cauinana in the Mountaine of Pistoya, which way he had taken passing from Pisa neare Lucques, in confidence of the Chancellors faction which affected the popular gouernment, he set vpon him with a very small company of men; and at the first charge the Prince who aduanced too boldly, was slaine, doing rather the office of a man at armes then of a Captaine. Nevertheless his soul-

ſouldiers got the victory, and tooke together with many others Iohn Paul de Cere, and Ferruccio, whom Maramus ſlue being priſoner, in reuenge (as he himſelfe confeſſed) for that at the ſiege of Volterra he had hanged an Herald that was ſent vnto him to deliuer a meſſage. The Florentines then found themſelues abandoned of all ſuccours both diuine and humane; and the famine increaſed without any further hope of remedy: neuertheles the obſtinacie of thoſe that oppoſed againſt the accord appeared ſtill greater; who being induced by a laſt deſpaire, to be vnwilling that their owne ruine ſhould happen without the deſtruction of their countrey, and deuiſing no more how either they or others might die for the ſafetie of their countrey, but that their country might periſh together with them, they were alſo followed of many who had perſwaded themſelues that God would worke a miracle, and ſend ſuccours, but not vntill things were reduced to ſuch termes as there remained in a maner no ſpirit. And there was danger leſt the war wold finiſh with the vtter deſtructiō of that Citie (for that the Magiſtrates were concurrant in this obſtinacie, and almoſt all thoſe that managed the publike authoritie: and, for feare of the Magiſtrates and the threats of armes, there was no meanes to contradict thoſe that were of the contrary opiniō) if Malateſta Baillō, ſeeing the affaires to be without remedy, had not in a maner forced them to accord, being haply moued by pitie and compaſſion, to ſee ſo excellent a Citie vtterly to periſh by the rage of the Citizens; and by the diſhonor and domage that might come to him to be preſent at ſo great a ruine; but much more, as was beleeued, by the hope to obtaine of the Pope by meanes of that accord, ſufferance to returne to Perouſa. Therefore when the Magiſtrates and ſuch as were moſt furious went about to cauſe the companies to iſſue out of the Citie to fight with the enemies, who exceeded them in numbers, and were lodged in a ſtrong place, and he refuſed it, they were ſo much incenſed, that they depoſed him from his charge of Captaine, and ſent ſome of the moſt obſtinate among them to denounce a commandement vnto him to go out of the Towne with his companies; wherewith he was ſo much moued, that he drew his poignard and hurt one of them, ſo that the reſidue had much ado to get him aliue out of his hands: wherewith the others being aſtoniſhed, and the whole Citie beginning to riſe, ſuch as were not ſo farre tranſported, beginning to reprehend the raſhneſſe of the Gonfalonnier, who armed himſelfe, ſometimes proteſting that he would aſſaile Malateſta, and ſometimes that he would iſſue out to fight with the enemies, at laſt the deſperate obſtinacie of many, gaue place to the extreme neceſſitie of all: inſomuch as foure Embaſſadours being ſent the ninth day of Auguſt to Don Ferrand de Gonzaga, who by reaſon of the death of the Prince of Orange held the chiefe place in the armie, the Marquis of Guaſt being gone away long before, the accord was made the day following; whereof, beſides that the Citie was bound to pay within a few dayes foureſcore thouſand duckats to raiſe the armie, the principall articles were: That the Pope and the Citie ſhould giue authoritie to the Emperour to declare within three moneths what ſhould be the forme of gouernment, their libertie alwayes reſerued: That all maner of iniuries done againſt the Pope, his friends and ſeruants, ſhould be pardoned: That vntill the declaration of the Emperour ſhould come, Malateſta Baillon ſhould remaine within the Citie in garriſon with two thouſand footmen. Which accord being made, whileſt the money was collecting for the armie, whereof there was need of a farre greater ſumme, for that in the Pope was found litle readineſſe to relieue the Citie with money in ſo great a danger, Bartholomew Valori the Popes Commiſſary practiſing vnderhand with Malateſta, who was wholly bent to returne to Perouſa, called the people together in the publike place, according to the ancient cuſtome to hold a Parliament; and the Magiſtrates and others agreeing thereunto for feare, they introduced a new forme of gouernment. The Parliament gaue power to twelue Citizens of the faction of the Medices, to diſpoſe as they thought good of the gouernment of the Citie; who reduced it to that forme which it was wont to carry before the yeare 1527. After this the army diſlodged when they had receiued money: but the Italian Captaines to defraud the ſouldiers, retired with the money into Florence (to the great ignominie of the military diſcipline,) giuing but a very litle to the footmen whom they had entertained, who remaining without Leaders, diſperſed themſelues into diuerſe places: and the Spaniards and Lance-knights who were fully payed, departing from all the townes and iuriſdiction of Florence, they went into the countrey of Sienna to reorder the gouernment of that Citie: and Malateſta Baillon, the Pope ſuffering him to returne to Perouſa, without tarrying for the declaration of the Emperour, left Florence wholly to the will of the Pope: in the which after all the ſouldiers were gone, gone, the perſecutions and puniſhments of the Citizens began; for that thoſe into whoſe power the gouerment was diuolued, partly the better to aſſure the State, & partly for the hatred conceiued againſt the authors of ſo many euils, and the memory of iniuries particularly receiued; but principally for that ſuch was the intention of the Pope (though he made it knowne to few) obſeruing haply the ſuperficies of the words, wreſted and peruerted the ſence, that the chapter whereby pardon was promiſed to ſuch as had iniured the Pope and his friends, extended not to the wrongs and crimes by them committed in matters that concerned the Commonweale: ſo that the examination of the matter being put into the hands of the Magiſtrates, ſix of the principals were beheaded, others impriſoned, and a very great number baniſhed: by reaſon whereof the Citie being the more weakened, and thoſe that had participated in theſe things reduced into great neceſſitie, the power of the Medices was found more free and abſolute, yea almoſt royall in that Citie much exhauſted of money by ſo long and great a warre, and made naked of many inhabitants both within and without, with the loſſe of their houſes and goods abroad, and more then euer deuided in it ſelfe: the which pouertie matle the neceſſitie yet far greater to prouide themſelues of victuals from forreine countries, for the generall ſcarcitie wherein the whole countrey was: for as much as for that yeare they had neither ſeed time nor harueſt: and this inconuenience did ſo hang vpon them for ſome yeares following, that more money went out of the Citie, being vnmeaſurably waſted and afflicted, to bring corne from forreine regions, and cattell from without their owne dominion, then had bene defrayed for the expences of ſo great and chargeable a warre.

In this meane while the Emperour hauing aſſembled the Diot at Auſbourg, cauſed Ferdinand his brother to be elected King of Romanes: and debating of the affaires of the Lutherans ſuſpected euen to the power of Princes, and for the multitude and ambition of their followers deuided into diuerſe hereſies in a maner contrary one to another, and to Martin Luther the author of that contagion, the life and authoritie of whom being now almoſt of no conſideration (ſo farre was this miſchiefe ſpread abroad, and had taken ſo deepe roote;) the Princes of Germanie could find no better remedy, then the celebration of a Councell. For both the Lutherans ſeeking to couer their cauſe with the authoritie of Religion, ſolicited it: and it was beleeued, that the authoritie of the decrees which the Councell ſhould ſet downe, would be ſufficient, if not to turne the minds of heretiks from their errors, yet at leaſt to reduce ſome of the multitude to the more ſound opinion: beſides that in Germanie euen thoſe that followed the Catholike opinions were very deſirous of a Councell, to the end to reforme the exceſſiue abuſes and great exactions of the Court of Rome: the which with the authoritie of Indulgences, and the largeneſſe of Diſpenſations, and with the Annates or yeerly fruits of Benefices that were giuen, together with the allowances that in the expedition of them reuerted to the offices infinitely multiplied in that Court, it ſeemed there was no other ſtudy or care then to exact by thoſe meanes a huge maſſe of treaſure throughout all Chriſtendome, without any regard in the meane time of the health of ſoules, nor that matters Eccleſiaſtike might be rightly gouerned: for that many incompatible Benefices were conferred vpon one perſon; and without any regard to the worthineſſe of men, they were diſtributed by fauour, either to perſons for their age incapable, or to men altogether vnlearned, and ſometimes (which is worſe) to perſons of euill life and conuerſation. The Emperour being very deſirous to ſatisfie this inſtance of all Germanie, and for that it was to good purpoſe alſo for his affaires, to appeaſe in that Prouince the cauſes of the tumults and the contumacie of the people, he vrged the Pope, by reducing to his memory the conference they had together at Bologna, to call a Councell, and promiſed him (to the end he ſhould not feare to haue his authoritie and dignitie brought into danger) to be there in perſon, to take care of him particularly. Nothing in the world was more diſpleaſing to the Pope then this, yet, to maintaine the opinion that men had of his good intention, he diſſembled his inclination. But fearing in effect, leſt the Councell, to moderate the abuſes of the Court and the indiſcreete grants of many Popes, would much diminiſh the Pontificall authoritie; or elſe, calling to mind that albeit at ſuch time as he was made Cardinall it had bene proued by witneſſes that he was borne in lawfull mariage, yet in truth it was otherwiſe; and albeit there could be found no law written that forbad him that was borne in that maner to aſcend to the Papacie, neuertheleſſe it was a very ancient and common opinion, that he that was not legitimate could not be a Cardinal: or remembring that he was raiſed to the ſea Apoſtolike

not without ſome ſuſpition of ſymonie practiſed with the Cardinall Colonno: or elſe leſt the great ſeueritie he had vſed againſt his countrey, with ſo many tumults of warre, ſhould make him perpetually infamous to the Councell, the rather for that it appeared by the effects, that he had bene moued, not as he publiſhed in the beginning, to reduce it to a good and moderate gouernment, but with ambition, and a deſire to bring it againe vnder the ſeruitude of his houſe: and for theſe cauſes abhorring the Councell, and not accounting the fidelitie of the Emperour a ſufficient ſuretie, when he had communicated the whole matter to the Cardinals deputed to the diſcuſſion of this matter, who alſo feared to be corrected by the Councell: he anſwered that there were many reaſons for the which it was not yet time to ſpeake thereof, for as much as peace was not yet wel eſtabliſhed among the Princes of Chriſtendome, and it was feared leſt the Turke would ſtirre againe, in which caſe it were not good that he ſhould find Chriſtendome encombred with the diſputations and contentions of a Councell: and yet making ſhew that he would referre it to the reſolution of the Emperour, he concluded, that he was contented that he ſhould promiſe in the Diot the indiction of a Councell, ſo that it might be celebrated in Italy, and in his preſence, due time being aſſigned for the aſſembling thereof: and that the Lutherans and other heretikes promiſing to ſtand to the determination of the Councell, ſhould in the meane while deſiſt from their corruptions, and rendring to the Sea Apoſtolike their due obedience, ſhould returne to their former maner of liuing like Chriſtian Catholikes: whereby all the matter was made more difficult. For the Lutherans not onely would not deſiſt from their opinions and ceremonies before the celebration of the Councell: and alſo it was beleeued, that they abhorred the Councell, for that they could expect no other thing thereof, then a reprobation of their opinions, ſeeing the moſt part and the principall of them had bene many times condemned as hereticall by ancient Councels; but that they inſiſted vpon the conuocation thereof, for that knowing it was a matter fearefull to the Popes, they perſwaded themſelues it would not be granted, and by that meanes they might ſupport their cauſe among the people with the greater authoritie.

1531. The yeare 1530 ended with theſe agitations, and the yeare 1531 ſucceeded, wherein was ſmall cauſe of troubles. For notwithſtanding it was comprehended by many ſignes that the French king was ill contented with the accords made with the Emperour, and very deſirous of new tumults, and that the King of England alſo had the ſame inclination, being angry with the Emperour, for that defending the ſiſter of his mother he impugned the matter of diuorce: neuertheleſſe the French King being both bare of money, and not well repoſed after the trauels of ſo long warres, the time was not yet fit to raiſe new troubles. But in the meane while he was diligent to practiſe as well in Germanie with ſuch Princes as bare minds eſtranged from the Emperour, as in Italy with the Pope, to whom, the better to aſſure his amitie, he made an ouerture of mariage betweene his ſecond ſonne and the Popes Neece: and (which he practiſed to the great offence of God, and with an horrible infamie to the Crowne of France, which had alwayes made principall profeſſion to defend Chriſtian Religion, for which merits it had gotten the title of Moſt Chriſtian) he held practiſes with the Prince of Turkes, to ſtirre him vp againſt the Emperour, towards whom the Turke was ordinarily ill diſpoſed, as well for his naturall hatred againſt the Chriſtian name, as for the controuerſies he had with his brother, tending to queſtions for the Realme of Hungarie with the Vayuod, of whom he had taken the protection: as alſo for that the greatneſſe of the Emperour began likewiſe to be ſuſpected of him. At this time the Imperiall Captaines leuied their forces from the territories of Sienna, to leade them to Piemont, when, to ſatisfie the Pope, they had reeſtabliſhed in Sienna the family of Montenous, to enioy their countrey and goods, but not to alter the forme of gouernment: and when for their ſuretie they had left a guard of three hundred Spaniſh footmen depending vpon the Duke of Malfe, vnder whom (for that he could not keepe his authoritie) things returned forthwith into the ſame diſorders, ſo that ſuch as had bene reſtored, departed away for feare. Alſo the Emperour pronounced the forme of gouernment for Florence, diſſembling that part of the authoritie giuen him which limited the ſauing of their libertie: for that according to the very inſtructions which the Pope had ſent vnto him, he decreed that the citie ſhould be gouerned with the ſame Magiſtrates and in the ſame maner as it was wont to be in the times when the Medices ruled it: and that Alexander the Popes nephew and his ſonne in law, ſhould be chiefe in the gouernment: and that in caſe of his death, the children and next deſcendants of the ſame family

mily ſhould ſucceed from hand to hand. He reſtored to the Citie all the priuiledges agreed vnto before times by him and his predeceſſors, but with this condition annexed, to loſe them as often as the Citie ſhould attempt any thing againſt the greatneſſe of the family of Medicis; inſerting through all the Decree, words which ſhewed that he tooke not his ground onely vpon the power that had bene giuen to him by the parties, but alſo vpon the authoritie and dignitie Imperiall. But hauing herein haply more ſatisfied the Pope then the faculties giuen him by the compromiſe, he offended him as much immediatly after in a matter which was very grieuous vnto him. For after the controuerſie betweene the Pope and the Duke of Ferrara was heard and examined by many Doctors to whom it was committed, whereupon both the parties had produced many teſtimonies and writings, and made a long courſe of pleading, he pronounced according to their counſell and relation, that Modena and Reggia appertained of right to the Duke of Ferrara, and that the Pope receiuing of him an hundred thouſand duckats, and reducing the tributes to the ancient cuſtome, ſhould inueſt him againe in the iuriſdiction of Ferrara. Therefore the Emperour laboured to perſwade the Pope, that if contrary to his promiſe made in Bologna, not to pronounce in caſe he found his cauſe not to be iuſt, he had giuen ſentence, that he was not to complaine thereof againſt him, but rather to blame the Biſhop of Vaſone his Nuncio, to whom he had not failed to giue notice that he would not pronounce ſentence, to the end not to be conſtrained to paſſe iudgement againſt the Pope: but the Biſhop being perſwaded otherwiſe, and ſuppoſing this to be done to free himſelfe of the promiſe he had made to giue ſentence if the right were in him, had preſſed ſo much the publication of the ſentence, that he was halfe conſtrained to it for the regard of his honour. Which excuſe the Pope had the ſooner admitted, if the ſentence had not bene in the ſame forme whereinto the Emperour had many times aſſayed to reduce the matter by accord. But that which offended moſt the Pope, was, that the Emperour in pronouncing vpon the matters of Modena and Reggia, had taken the courſe of a rigorous Iudge, but in the affaires of Ferrara, wherein the rigour was manifeſtly for him, he had done the office of a friendly Arbitrator. Therefore he would neither ratifie the ſentence, nor accept the paiment of the money wherein the Duke was condemned; neither did he at the next feaſt of Saint Peter accept the tribute which was publikely offered to him, according to the ancient cuſtome. But the Emperour for all that forbare not to conſigne to the Duke of Ferrara, Modena, which he had detained in pledge till that day, leauing them to decide afterwards the differences between themſelues. By reaſon whereof there was not for many moneths betweene the Pope and the Duke of Ferrara either an open warre or an aſſured peace, the Pope wholly applying himſelfe to oppreſſe him with wiles, or to expect an occaſion to wrong him openly with the aide of great Princes.

This yeare of 1531 brought forth no other accidents, and the tranquillitie alſo went on continuing the yeare following, which was more dangerous for forreine warres then for the emotions of Italy. For, the Turke being inflamed with the ignominie of his repulſe at Vienna, and vnderſtanding that the Emperour was in Germanie, he prepared a very mightie army, and magnifying his prouiſions, he publiſhed, that his intention was to conſtraine the Emperour to come to battell with him. For the renowme of which preparations the Emperour put himſelfe in as good order as he could, reuoking into Germanie the Marquis of Guaſt with his Spaniſh regiments, and a great band of horſemen and footmen Italians. The Pope promiſed to aide him with fortie thouſand duckats for euery moneth, and ſent to this expedition as Legat Apoſtolike his nephew the Cardinall de Medicis: and the Princes and free townes of Germanie prepared in fauour of the Emperour, and for the common defence of Germanie, a very great armie: but the effects were nothing anſwerable to the renowme and the feare: for that Soliman, who came very late into Hungarie, and could arriue no ſooner, as well for the greatneſſe of his preparations, as for the length of the way, drew not directly with his army to the place where the Emperor was, but onely hauing repreſented the warre, and made a great incurſion, he returned to Conſtantinople. And in the Emperour there appeared no greater forwardneſſe; for although he vnderſtood that the Turkes drew neare, he made not out to meete them; and when he heard of their retraite, he omitted to purſue with all his forces the faire occaſion that was offered to reconquer Hungarie for his brother; but burning in deſire to returne into Spaine, he gaue order that the Italian footmen, with a certaine number of Lanceknights ſhould go to the enterpriſe of Hungarie; which deſigne was immediatly diſordered, for that the Italians puſhed on by ſome

of their Captaines, who ſaw that the charge of the enterpriſe was giuen to others, ſo mutined, that hauing no reaſon to alleage for their tumult, and the preſence of the Emperour who went in perſon to ſpeake vnto them, being not ſufficient to appeaſe them; they reſolutely tooke their way into Italy, marching with great haſte for feare to be followed, and in their way burning many villages and houſes as lands of their enemies, in reuenge as they ſaid of the burnings committed in many places in Italy by the Lanceknights. The Emperour alſo tooke his way towards Italy, and hauing ſet downe in what order, and by what places his Court and all his traine ſhould paſſe, the Cardinall de Medicis, carried with the raſhneſſe of youth, not obeying the order generally giuen to all the traine, aduanced and got before together with Peter Maria Roſſo, vpon whom chiefly was layed the fault of this ſedition. Wherewith the Emperour being wroth, but chiefly for that attributing the cauſe hereof to the Cardinall, he feared leſt the ſaid Cardinall who was ill contented that Alexander his couſin was preferred to the adminiſtration of the Eſtate of Florence, would go after the footbands to leade them to trouble the affaires of Tuſcan, he cauſed him to be apprehended by the way, and with him Peter Maria Roſſo: but afterwards conſidering better the importance of the matter, he wrote preſently that he ſhould be deliuered, and made many excuſes as well to the Cardinall as to the Pope. Peter Maria remained priſoner, but ſoone after he was releaſed, the iniury which he ſeemed to haue done to the Cardinall, helping him much (as was beleeued) with the Emperour.

Enterview of the king of England and the French king.

The departure of the Turke deliuered Italy of an imminent warre: for that the French King and the King of England being full of hatred and diſdaine againſt the Emperour, met together betweene Calice and Bulleine, where perſwading themſelues that the Turke would abide that Winter in Hungarie, and by that meanes would hold the forces of the Emperour intangled, they conſulted that the French king ſhould inuade the Duchie of Millan: and hauing a diſpoſition to draw the Pope to their part by violence and aſtoniſhment, ſeeing they could neuer allure him by other meanes, they deuiſed to take from him the obedience of their kingdomes in caſe he would not conſent to that which they deſired, which was that the French king wold haue the State of Millan, and the King of England a ſentence for him in the cauſe of diuorce; and they had determined to ſend to him with ſharp commiſſions, the Cardinals of Tournon and Tarbes, perſonages of great authoritie with the French king. But the newes which they receiued of the retiring of the Turke before the time of their enterview was determined, moderated theſe deuiſes, and alſo was the cauſe that the King of England ſent not for the Ladie Anne Bulleine to Calice, to celebrate the mariage with her publikely in that aſſembly, notwithſtanding the cauſe of diuorce was hanging in the Court of Rome, and that he was forbidden by writs Apoſtolike, vnder paine of very great cenſures, to innouate any thing to the preiudice of the firſt mariage: and yet the French king to demonſtrate to the King of England that he bare no good will to the Romane Church, impoſed by his owne authoritie vpon the Clergie of all his Realme a taxe of tenths, and diſpatched the two Cardinals to the Pope, but with conditions farre differing from thoſe which were preſcribed at the firſt.

A ſecond enterview of the Pope and the Emperour at Bologna.

The Emperour came into Italy, and deſiring to ſpeake with the Pope, the place of their meeting was eſtſoones aſſigned at Bologna, which the Pope accepted willingly, to giue no occaſion to the Emperour to go to the Realme of Naples (as many of his Court perſwaded him,) and by that occaſion to make a longer abode in Italy; which was alſo againſt the intention of the Emperour, who deſired to paſſe into Spaine for many reaſons, but chiefly for the deſire he had to haue children by his wife who remained there. Therefore they met at the end of the yeare at Bologna, where were obſerued betweene them the ſame demonſtrations of amitie, and the ſame offices of familiaritie which they had vſed before; but their wils were no more correſpondent as they had beene in their former negociations. For the Emperour had a great deſire of the Councell, for the repoſe and contentment of Germanie: he offered to diſſolue the armie, which was very chargeable both to him and others; but to the end he might do it ſafely, he inſiſted to haue the laſt league made at Bologna renewed, both to comprehend in it all the Italians, and to taxe the ſummes of money which euery one was to contribute if Italy were inuaded by the French. He deſired alſo to haue Katherine the Popes Neece maried to Francis Sforce, as well to preſſe the Pope by a greater neceſſitie to looke to the preſeruation of that Eſtate, as to breake the practiſe of affinitie that was ſolicited with the French king. Of all which things not one was

acceptable to the Pope, for that the confederation was contrary to the desire he had to stand newter as much as he could betweene the Princes of Christendome: doubting, both other dangers, and especially lest the French king (who was so much pressed thereunto by the King of England) would depriue him of the obedience of his kingdome. Touching the Councell, it was a matter very grieuous vnto him for the ancient causes: and the alliance with the Duke of Millan pleased him not, for that he would not be at open enmitie with the French king, with whose second sonne he had a vehement desire to conioyne his Neece. These matters were handled, but principally that of the confederation: and for this negociation of many moneths were deputed for the Emperour, Cuoues, the great Commander of Lions, Granuelle, and Prata his chiefe Counsellors: and for the Pope the Cardinall de Medicis, Iames Saluiati, and Guiccardin: who not refusing to go through with the confederation (for that had bene to discouer too much the Popes intention, and to giue cause to the Emperour iustly to conceiue a great suspition of him,) made instance that all meanes should be vsed to cause the Venetians to consent vnto it, alleaging that without them the defence would be but weake, and that the common affaires would be preserued with better reputation if the renowme of the former confederation were maintained: whereas if another were made without them, it would make the world beleeue that there were discord betweene the Emperour, the Pope, and the Venetians. In this regard the Venetians were solicited to condescend to a new confederation for the defence of all Italy, for as much as by the first League their obligation extended no further then for the affaires of Millan and Naples: and the Emperour was very desirous that they might be bound likewise to the defence of Genes, where it was thought, that when the warre was on foote, the French men would easily make their first attempt: for that they would pretend, by reason of their rights and interests particular, they might do it without swaruing from the contracts of Madril and Cambray. But the Senate of Venice refused to renew the confederation, or to amplifie the obligations contained in the same, whereby they much discontented the Emperour, although they affirmed they would inuiolably obserue that coniunction: and yet the Emperour was so much the more importunate herein with the Pope, refuting all reasons that were alleaged to the contrary, that the articles of the confederation began to be communed vpon; and all the Potentates of Italy were summoned, who sent Embassadours to this negociation: who were required to enter into the League, contributing in case of warre, euery one according to his power and possibilitie: wherein none of them making any difficultie, but labouring euery one to abate somewhat of that which was demanded for the contribution, Alphonso d'Este onely propounded that he might not enter into a league to defend the States of others, if first he were not assured of his owne. For how may it be conuenient for him to accord, that was to defend himselfe against the Pope, and enter league with him? how could he contribute with his money to the defence of Millan and Genes, if he were compelled to expend it continually to keepe bands of souldiers within Modena and Reggia, and also for the suretie of Ferrara? Vpon this demand arose a new practise to accord him with the Pope: who bearing a mind far estranged therefrō, and yet not purposing to oppose himselfe so apparently against the instance of the Emperour, he propounded conditions which were impossible to be obserued, affirming that if he should leaue Modena and Reggia to Alphonso (who otherwise would not come to accord) that he would haue Alphonso to acknowledge them in fealtie of the Sea Apostolike; the which for that it could not be done in such sort as might be iudicially available without the consent of the Electors and Princes of the Empire, it brought the Emperour into a difficultie which had no issue. Therefore he began to intreate the Pope, that at least during the league he would be bound not to vexe the State which Alphonso held: and after many disputes, the Pope consented to assure him for eighteene moneths; and so at last there was a conclusion made of the League, which was passed and contracted vpon Saint Matthias day; a day very happie to the Emperour. This league and confederation contained an obligation of the Emperour, the King of Romanes, and all the other Potentates of Italy except the Venetians, for the defence of Italy, yet without naming the Florentines therein any otherwise then they were named in the league of Congnac, and that to the end not to trouble their commerce in the Realme of France. It was set downe with what number of souldiers euery one should be concurrant therein, and what summe of money they should contribute for euery moneth, to wit, for the Emperour thirtie thousand duckats, the Pope for himselfe and the Florentines twentie thousand, the Duke of Millan lan fifteene thouſand, the Duke of Ferrara ten thouſand, the Genowayes ſixe thouſand, the State of Sienna ten thouſand, and the Citie of Lucques a thouſand: and that (to the end to be found prepared againſt all ſodaine and vnlooked for inuaſions vntil ſuch time as defence might be made with the contributions aforenamed) there ſhould be preſently leuied a loane of money almoſt equall to the contributions, which ſhould not be expended vnleſſe the preparations to inuade Italy were manifeſtly diſcerned. There was alſo ſet downe a ſmall contribution yearely, for the entertainment of thoſe Captaines that remained in Italy, and to pay certaine penſions to the Swiſſers, to the end they might not haue cauſe to giue footmen to the French king: and by common conſent Anthonie de Leua was declared Captaine generall of all the League, with ordinance that he ſhould remaine in the Duchie of Millan.

The Pope will not hearken to a Councell.

Touching the Councell there was nothing concluded to the liking of the Emperour, who ſolicited the Pope to call it preſently; which he refuſed to do, alleaging that in that ill diſpoſition of mens minds, there was danger leſt the Kings of England and France would refuſe it, and that the Councell being celebrated without them, it could introduce neither vnion nor reformation of the Church; yea, it was much to be feared leſt it would diuolue to a ſchiſme: That he was very well content to ſend out Nuncios to all the Princes, to induce them to ſo holy a worke. And the Emperour replying, What if they differ from vs without iuſt cauſe? and preſſing the Pope in that caſe to intimate the Councell, he could neuer diſpoſe him to it: ſo that his Nuncios were aſſigned and ſent out, with a very ſlender hope to bring backe any good concluſion. But the Emperour was no better ſatisfied touching the negociation of the affinitie; for that when the two Cardinals ſent by the French king were come to Bologna, and had introduced againe the negociation of the mariage with the ſecond ſonne of the King, the Pope gaue anſwer touching the mariage with the Duke of Millan propounded by the Emperour: That the King hauing long before made an ouerture of mariage for his ſonne, and he hauing hearkened vnto it by the conſent of the Emperour, who at that time ſeemed to be well content therewith, he ſuppoſed he ſhould do great wrong to the French king, if during theſe negociations he ſhould giue his Neece in mariage to one of his enemies: That he was perſwaded, that that practiſe was artificially introduced by the French king to entertaine him, and not with intention to conclude it; ſeeng there was betweene the parties ſo great diſparitie of degree and condition; but that he would not do the King ſo great wrong, if this practiſe were not firſt abſolutely broken off. And when the Emperour could not be perſwaded that the French king would adioyne his ſonne to a match ſo farre vnequall to him, he aduiſed the Pope, that for the diſcouerie of the Kings frauds, he ſhould preſſe the Cardinals to ſend for a procuration to make the contract, who ſhewing themſelues very forward herein, cauſed it to be accompliſhed in few dayes in very ample forme: by reaſon whereof, not onely all hope of affinitie with Francis Sforce was loſt, but alſo the ſolicitation with the French king was followed more hotely; and thereunto was further added (according to the deuice betweene them long before) that the Pope and the French king ſhould contract together at Nice, a Citie belonging to the Duke of Sauoy, ſtanding vpon the riuer of Var, which ſeparateth Italy from Prouence. Theſe things were very offenſiue to the Emperour, as well for a ſuſpition leſt betweene the Pope and the French king there would be concluded a greater coniunction to his preiudice (for he knew well enough how much the French king deſired it,) as for feare leſt the Pope ſhould call to mind his impriſonment, the ſack of Rome, and the mutation of Florence, being moued alſo with diſdaine, for that the honour which the Pope had done to him in making two iourneys to Bologna to ſpeake with him, would be diminiſhed, yea aboliſhed, if he ſhould go ſo farre as Nice to meete with the French king. And he diſſembled not this diſpleaſure and the cauſes thereof, but in vaine; for that in the Popes mind was fixed an ardent deſire of this affinitie, being moued rather by ambition and appetite of glorie, in that being of a houſe in a maner ſimple and priuate, he ſhould obtaine for a baſtard Nephew of his, a baſtard daughter of ſo mightie an Emperour, and now had obtained for his Neece legitimate, a legitimate ſonne of the French king; then induced by that which many counſelled him, to wit, that by the meanes of that affinitie he might giue colour of right (though more apparent then true) to pretend for his ſonne and for his daughter in law the Eſtate of Florence. To theſe diſcontentments of the Emperour was added, almoſt as a full accompliſhment, that making inſtance to the Pope to create three Cardinals by him propounded, he obtained it with difficultie onely for the Archbiſhop of Bary, the Pope excuſing himſelfe vpon the contradiction of the Colledge of Cardinals: neither was the Emperour appeased by the readineſſe of the Pope to make a ſecret confederation with him, wherein he promiſed to proceed iudicially to the cenſures, and to all things that he might rightly do againſt the King of England, and againſt Anne Bolleine: and they bound themſelues to make no new confederations or accords with any Princes, without the reciprocall conſent one of another. The Emperour departed from Bologna the day after the confederation was contracted, being now well aſſured in himſelf, that the ſaid mariage would go on, together with the enterpriſe betweene the Pope and the French king, and doubted alſo of ſome greater coniunction. Being embarked at Genes, he paſſed into Spaine, with a firme purpoſe (as it is reported) if the mariage of Katherine de Medicis were celebrated with the ſecond ſonne of France, to diſſolue the match made betweene his daughter and Alexander de Medicis. Not many dayes after the Pope departed to go to Rome, accompanied with the two French Cardinals, nothing troubled with the new confederation, for that the Pope, who excelled in ſimulations and practiſes, wherein he was not ſurmounted with feare, had told them, that vpon concluding the League the Spaniſh armie was to diſſolue, which would do the French king more good then the confederation could endomage him; chiefly ſeeing that as well for the obligations as the obſeruation thereof, there might happen many difficulties and ſundry impediments.

Thus the practiſes begun continued betweene them: and the King deſiring for his honour, and for ambition rather then for any other thing, that the Pope ſhould come to Nice, he promiſed (to draw him thither) not to require of him any confederation, nor to incenſe him to war, and much leſſe to draw him from termes of iuſtice in the cauſe of the King of England, nor to importune him to create new Cardinals: and he was much puſhed on herein by the King of England, who had now ſolemnely maried the Lady Anne Bolleine, by whom hauing procreated a daughter, he had, to the preiudice of the daughter of his firſt wife, declared her Princeſſe of the Realme of England; a title which is transferred to ſuch as are neareſt the Crowne: by reaſon whereof, the Pope not able to diſſemble ſo great a contempt againſt the Sea Apoſtolike, nor to refuſe iuſtice to the Emperour, had with the aduice of the Conſiſtory, publiſhed that King guiltie of the crime of contempt; which cauſed him to deſire the affinitie and enteruiew of the Pope with the French king, hoping the King would be a meanes to remedie his cauſe; and that the Pope being induced (as he hoped) to commune of new matters againſt the Emperour, he would deſire to reſtore him, and to draw him into their coniunction, and as it were to conſtitute almoſt a Triumuirate, to giue lawes to the affaires of Italy. At laſt his going was concluded, but not to Nice, for that the Duke of Sauoy, not to diſpleaſe the Emperor, made difficultie to grant the Caſtle to the Pope; but to Marſeilles, according to the Kings deſire, who eſteemed it a matter more honorable for him, that the enteruiew ſhould be made in his kingdome, and with the contentment of the Pope, as one that deſired to ſatisfie him more with demonſtrations, and in pleaſing his ambition, then with effects. The Pope laboured to perſwade all men, that he went to this enteruiew principally to ſolicite peace, to perſwade the enterpriſe againſt the Infidels, and to reduce the King of England to good wayes; and laſtly, onely for the common intereſts. But being not able to diſſemble the true cauſe, before he departed he ſent his Neece to Nice vpon the gallies which the Duke of Albanie Vncle to the yong Lady, had brought out of France to paſſe the Pope: which gallies after they had brought the Lady to Nice, returned to the port of Piſa, and on the fourth of October they took the perſon of the Pope with many Cardinals, whom with a very happie nauigation they brought in few dayes to Marſeilles; where when he had made his ſolemne entrie, the French king, who had viſited him before by night, entred ſoone after. They were lodged in one and the ſame Pallace, and vſed very great demonſtrations of amitie: and the King, who eſpecially laboured to win him, prayed him to ſend for his Neece to Marſeilles; which being willingly performed by the Pope, who ſpake not thereof to the King, to ſhew that he would firſt debate of the common affaires; as ſoone as the Ladie was come, the contracts were made, and with as much ſpeed the conſummation of the mariage, to the incredible ioy of the Pope, who handled his matters ſo cunningly with the King, that the King became wonderfull confident in him, and ſhewed him great affection: neuertheleſſe contrary to the opinion of all men, and of the Emperour himſelfe, no capitulation was paſſed betweene them. It is very true that the Pope ſhewed himſelfe alwayes deſirous that the State of Millan might be gotten for the Duke of Orleans husband to his Neece; a matter which the

King desired much, for a hatred and disdaine he bare to the Emperour, but much more for that the Duke of Orleans being put into such an Estate, he thought that would quench the occasions of contention betweene his children after his death, which otherwise he feared might fall amongst them for the title of the Duchie of Brittaine, which the King in the yeare before (contrary to the couenants made by King Lewis with those people) had vnited to the Crowne of France, whereunto he had induced the subiects of that State to consent, more by his kingly authoritie, then of their owne inclination: and not onely the King obtained nothing of him in the cause of the King of England, but also for the inciuilities of his seruants, and for that they were found in the Popes chamber, protesting and appealing from him to the Councell, shewing himselfe angrie, he told the Pope, it should nothing offend him, if he pursued their King and his cause according to the rule of iustice. He offended not the Popes mind in any thing, sauing that rather to satisfie some about him then himselfe, he intreated him to create three Cardinals in his fauour; which was a matter not a litle discontenting to the Pope, not so much for the instance which the Emperours Embassadour made to the contrary, as for that he esteemed it a matter of great consequence, both for the election of future Popes, and for the disobediences which might happen in his life and after, to adde so many Cardinals to the French nation, which had already sixe. Neuertheless for a lesse euill, he consented to this demand; and besides these he created a brother of the Duke of Albanie, to whom he had before promised the Cardinals Hat. In regard of all other things there seemed to be betweene them great affiance and contentment, the French king hauing communicated vnto him many of his counsels, and among others his determination to stirre vp against the Emperour some of the Princes of Germanie, and chiefly the Lantgraue van Hesse, and the Duke of Wertemberg, who the Sommer following drew into commotion. When they had remained at Marseilles about a moneth, the Pope returned vpon the same gallies, with the which, after he had bene much tormented vpon the sea, being arriued at Sauona, neither trusting to the prouision of the gallies, nor the skill of those that gouerned them, he sent them backe, and was conducted to Ciuitauecchia in the gallies of Andrew Dore: and being returned to Rome, with very great reputation and wonderfull felicitie, especially to such as had seene him prisoner in the Castle of Saint Angelo, he enioyed the full fauour of fortune for a few moneths, presaging already in his mind, that which was speedily to happen. For it is manifest, that almost as soone as he was returned from Marseilles, as if he were assured of his death which approched, he caused the Ring to be made, and all the other habites accustomed to bury Popes, assuring his familiars, with a very setled mind, that he should speedily die. And yet not leauing his accustomed cares and studies, he solicited, as he thought, for the greater suretie of his house, to build a very strong Citadell within Florence, not knowing how soone the felicitie of his Nephewes was to end, of whom, being mortall enemies one to another, Hippolito the Cardinal died before the end of the yeare after the Popes death, not without suspition of poison, and Alexander the other Nephew, who commanded at Florence, was (with great note of indiscretion) secretly slaine by night in Florence by Laurence of the same family of Medicis.

The Pope fell sicke about the beginning of Sommer, and his griefe was a paine of the stomacke, whereunto a feauer being conioyned, and being a long time tormented with that and other accidents, sometimes he seemed to be reduced to the point of death, and sometimes so eased, that he gaue to others, but not to himselfe, an hope of recouery. During the time of which malady, the Duke of Wertemberg by the aide of the Lantgraue van Hesse and other Princes, and the helpe of the money of France, recouered the Duchie of wertemberg, which the King of Romanes possessed: and these fearing a greater combustion, agreed with the King of Romanes, against the will of the French king, who was in hope that the Emperour in regard of these emotions, would stand intangled with a long and tedious warre, and that haply their armies being victorious, would descend vpon the Duchie of Millan. In like sort at that time Barbarossa being made Bassa and Captaine generall of Solimans army by sea, passed to the conquest of the kingdome of Thunis, and in his way thither he ouerran the sea coasts of Calabria, and ran vp aboue Gaieta, by meanes whereof some of his souldiers being set on land, sacked Fondy, with such affeare to the Court and peoples of Rome, as it was supposed, if they had passed further, that the Citie of Rome had bin left abandoned. But this accident was kept from the knowledge of the Pope, who at last being no longer able to resist his malady, departed out of this life the fiue and twentieth day of September, leauing behind him in the Castle of Saint Angelo many iewels, in the Pontificall Chamber infinite offices, but contrary to the opinion of all men a very small summe of money. He was raised from base degree to the place of Popedome with a wonderfull felicitie: but being Pope he had experience of a very great variety of fortune: and if both were euenly ballanced, his euill fortune was farre greater then his good. For what felicitie may be compared to the misery of his imprisonment? to haue seene the sacke of Rome, with so great a ruine and destruction? and that he was the cause of so great desolation to his countrey? He died hated of the Court, suspected of Princes, and with a fame rather hatefull then acceptable: being accounted couetous, of small fidelitie, and naturally farre off from doing pleasures to men: by reason whereof, albeit during the time of his Pontificacie he created one and thirtie Cardinals, he neuer made any to content himselfe, but almost alwayes by necessitie, except the Cardinall de Medicis, whom (when he was oppressed with a dangerous malady, and at such a time as if he had died, he had left his friends and kindred in the state of beggers, and depriued of all aide) he created Cardinall rather at the perswasion of others then by his proper and voluntary election; and yet he was very graue, well aduised in his actions, a conquerour of himselfe, and of a great spirit, if timorousnesse had not oftentimes corrupted his iudgement. When he was dead, the Cardinals who shut themselues the same night into the Conclaue, elected in his place with full voice Alexander, of the family of Farnese, a Romane by nation, and the most ancient Cardinall of all the Court: their voices being found conformable to the iudgement and (in a maner) instance that Clement had made, as of a person worthy to be preferred before all the others to so great a degree, seeing he was both learned, and of good life in appearance: and the Cardinals elected him the more willingly, for that he being already vpon the threescore and seuenth yeare of his age, and supposed to be of a weake complexion and sickly, which opinion he nourished with art, they had some hope he would not sit long in the seate: the actions and operations of whom, whether they answered the expectation conceiued of him, or the incredible ioy which the people of Rome tooke, to haue after the end of an hundred and three yeares, and after the succession of thirteene Popes, a Pope of bloud a Romane, those may beare witnesse who shall write of the accidents hapning in Italy after his election. For the prouerbe is very true, and well to be noted, which saith, The office setteth out the worthinesse of the person that manageth it.

ing they depended vpon the will of another, and that which more is, of very diuers accidents: yea, be it they ſhould obtaine ſuccors, much leſſe were that to auoide or ſhake off, but rather to redouble and make greater the calamities of the warre, being vexed at one time by the inuaſions of ſouldiers of the enemy, and tormented with the oppreſſions and inſolencies of the men of warre that come to their ſuccors: Which miſeries (he ſaid) would be ſo much the more grieuous to beare, by how much in the end they would come to ſee and know, that it was not for their proper libertie they tooke armes, but for the impery of a ſtranger, changing one ſeruitude for another: for that this is proper to all Princes, not to enter into the trauels and expences of a warre, but to reigne ouer thoſe for whom they fight: And yet your warre (ſaith he) ſeeing the great wealth and neighbourhood of the Florentines, (by whom you ſhall find many and perpetuall vexations) you cannot be able to ſuſtaine, but with very great difficulties.

In this generall confuſion of things, the King departeth from Piſa towards Florence, and is not reſolued what forme he would giue to the affaires of the Piſans; he ſtayed in a place called Signa, ſeuen miles from Florence, to be aduertiſed afore he entred the Citie, whether the tumult of the people were in any ſort appeaſed, who had not diſcontinued their vprores ſince the day that Peter de Medicis was chaſed out of the Citie: he had withall this intention, to giue time to Monſieur d'Aubigny, whom he had ſent for (to the end his entry might ſo much the more aſtoniſh the Florentines) with direction to leaue the artillery at Caſtrocare, and giue leaue to the fiue hundred men at armes Italians, which were with him in Romagnia, together with the men at armes of the Duke of Millan, except the Count Caiazze, which followed Monſieur d'Aubigny with three hundred light horſemen. It was ſuppoſed by many tokens and coniectures, that the intention of the King was to draw the Florentines by feare of his power, to yeeld vnto him the dominion abſolute of the Citie: a thing which himſelfe could not diſſemble with their Embaſſadors, hauing often recourſe to Signa, to make perfect the accord that was contracted. It was without doubt, that the King bare a mind inflamed againſt them, and nouriſhed many ill diſpoſed meanings againſt their Citie, for that they ſought to hinder him in his enterpriſe. And albeit it was manifeſt, that that reſiſtance proceeded not of the will of the Commonweale, which in reaſonable ſort had iuſtified themſelues; yet he could not eaſily forget and diſſolue the impreſſion of the offence, being (as it was ſuppoſed) much induced to their diſfauours, by many of his Councell and Lords; who iudging it not meete to let paſſe the oportunitie to make himſelfe Lord ouer the Citie, or perhaps puſhed forward with their proper ambition and couetouſneſſe, were loth to loſe the occaſion to ſacke a Citie, abounding in ſuch treaſures and wealth: in ſo much as there ranne a brute through the campe, that the Citie had deſerued to be puniſhed, to ſerue as an example to others, being the towne in Italy that had preſumed to oppoſe againſt the power and army of France. There were alſo of the chiefeſt of his Councell, that ſolicited him to reſtore Peter de Medicis to his former degree: for whom, with a peculiar diligence aboue the reſidue, did labour Philip Lord of Breſſe, brother to the Duke of Sauoy, being induced to that office by the priuate friendſhips and promiſes that had paſſed betweene them: in ſo much, that either by the perſwaſions of them that could do moſt, (notwithſtanding the Biſhop of S. Malo counſelled the contrary) or by a hope to make the Florentines more inclined to his wil by this feare; or laſtly to haue occaſion to take vpon the ſodaine what part or way he would. The King wrote to Peter, cauſing alſo the Lord Philip to do the like, and aduiſed him to come neare to Florence, for that for the ancient friendſhip that had bene betweene their houſes, and for his owne particular readineſſe and good will ſhewed in the conſignation of the fortreſſes, he was determined to redreſſe him and reſtore him to his firſt authoritie. But theſe letters found him not at Bologna, according to the Kings weening; for that what by the rough words of Iohn Bentiuole, and doubt he ſhould be purſued by the Duke of Millan, and haply alſo by the French king, he was for his misfortunes retired to Venice, whither they were ſent to him by his brother the Cardinall remaining then at Bologna. At Florence they doubted much of the Kings will; and yet, not ſeeing with what force or with what hopes they might reſiſt him, they agreed (as a counſell leaſt dangerous) to receiue him into their Citie, hoping there would ſome meanes ariſe to appeaſe him. And yet making the beſt of their perils, and becauſe they would be prouided for all fortunes, they ordained that the houſes of moſt of the Citizens ſhould be ſecretly repleniſhed with men naturall of the dominion of Florence; and that the Captaines which were in the pay of the Commonweale (diſſembling notwithſtanding the occaſion) ſhould enter the

Citie with many of their bands and ſouldiers; and that euery one within the towne and places about it, ſhould ſtand vpon ready guard to take armes at the alarme of the great bell of the publike pallace. After this the King marched to Florence with his army, wherein was expreſſed no litle pompe, as well by the glory and magnificence of thoſe of his Court, as by them of the towne: he entred in ſigne of victory, armed himſelfe and his horſe, with his Lance vpon his thigh, and immediatly began to ſpeake of compoſition, but that was not without many difficulties: for, beſides the immoderate fauours which ſome of the French Court bare to Peter de Medicis, and the demands of money intollerable made by the King, he demanded openly the impery of Florence, alleaging that according to the orders of warre in the Realme of France, he had lawfully wonne it, ſeeing his entry was armed according to the cuſtomes of conquerours. From which demand albeit he went in the end, yet ſought hetro leaue at Florence certaine men of the long coate (ſo are called in France Lawyers, Doctors, and men of Iuſtice) as his Embaſſadors, with ſuch authoritie, that according to the inſtitutions of France, he might pretend to be giuen to him for euer no litle iuriſdiction. But on the contrary, the Florentines were obſtinate to preſerue their full libertie, hapning what perils ſoeuer; inſomuch that communicating together with ſuch a contrarietie of wils, albeit the minds of both parts were continually kept in hot and angry moods, yet neither faction ſhewed readineſſe to determine the difference by armes: for, the people of Florence giuen of long to the following of merchandize, and not to the exerciſe of warre, ſuffered no ſmall feares, hauing within their owne walls one ſo mightie a King with his army full of nations vnknowne and furious. And to the French men was no litle amaze the conſideration of the great multitude of peoples, who, ſince the dayes that the gouernment changed, had gathered boldneſſe and audacitie aboue expectation: They were aſtoniſhed beſides at the common brute, that at the alarme of the great bell, there would flocke infinite troupes of people from all parts confining. In which common feare on both ſides, at the noiſe of euery falſe alarme that was heard, either part for his proper ſuretie tooke armes, but not one did aſſaile or prouoke another. The foundation which the King ſought to worke by Peter de Medicis, was ſupplanted; for that Peter wauering between the hope that was promiſed him, and the feare that he ſhould be giuen vp as a prey to his aduerſaries, asked counſell of the Senate of Venice touching the Kings letters. Truly there is nothing more neceſſary in great deliberations, and on the other ſide nothing more dangerous then to demand counſell: And albeit counſell is leſſe neceſſary to men diſcreet, then to ſuch as are not tempered, yet no doubt the profits are not few which wiſe men reape by counſels, ſeeing no man hath that perfect wiſedome to conſider alwayes, and know all things of himſelfe; and in reaſons contrary or different, is able alwayes to diſcerne the better part. But what aſſurance hath he that asketh counſell, to receiue counſell, according to the faith he repoſeth? ſeeing if there be no equall fidelitie nor affection, but regard to particular intereſts, as profit, reuenge, or ſome other motion; he that giueth the counſell, dreſſeth it to that end which beſt anſwereth his purpoſe: ſo that thoſe ends being for the moſt part vnknowne to him that comes to askes counſell, he perceiueth not (if he be not wiſe) the treaſon and infidelitie of the counſell. The experience was ſeene in the condition of Peter de Medicis: for, the Venetians iudging, that if he returned into his countrey, it would be a cauſe to giue the King a greater facilitie to his demands and deſires of the Florentines, (a thing preiudiciall to them, and contrary to the courſe of their affaires) perſwaded him by many liuely reaſons (counſelling rather for themſelues then for him) that he ſhould not put himſelfe in the power of a King of France, holding himſelfe iniured by him: Wherein the better to encourage him to the following of their counſell, they offered him to embrace his affaires, and as time and neceſſitie required, to miniſter to him all meanes and fauours conuenient for his reſtitution; wherefore the better to be aſſured that he ſhould not then depart Venice, they ſet vpon him (if the common brute be true) very ſecret eſpiall and guard. But now for Florence, in this meane while mens hearts were inflamed on all parts, and almoſt carried into maniſeſt contention: the King would nothing abate of his later demands, nor the Florentines be bound to ſummes of money ſo intollerable, and much leſſe conſent to any iuriſdiction or preheminence in their Eſtate. All which difficulties not being able almoſt to be diſſolued without armes, were euen preſently decided by the vertue of Peter Capponi, one of the foure deputed to treate with the King: this Capponi was a man of ſpirit and great courage, and ſpeciall reputation in Florence, as well for his parts and qualities, as for that he was of an honorable family, and deſcended of perſonages who had bene great rule in the Commonweale. As he and his companions were one day in the presence and audience of the King, and that one of the Kings Secretaries read the vnreasonable capitulations offered by the King, at the last he in a great fury snatched the articles out of the Secretaries hands, and tare them before the eyes of the King, saying with a heart resolute, and loud voice: Seeing you demand of vs things so dishonest, sound you vp your trumpets, and we will ring our bells, let all things be ruled by the sentence of the sword; and in the same heate flings with great suddennesse out of the chamber, being followed of his companions. The words of this Citizen, whom the King and his Court had already knowne, for that a few moneths before he had bene in France in legation for them of Florence, astonished them all in such sort (specially for that they could not beleeue that such a boldnesse was without occasion) that they called him backe againe, and without speaking more of demands, whereunto the Florentines had no will to condescend, the King and the Citie fell to composition in this sort: That all quarrels and iniuries forgotten and cancelled, the Citie of Florence should be friend, confederate, and in the perpetuall protection of the Crowne of France: That for the suretie of the King, the citie of Pisa and towne of Liuorne, with all their castles, should remaine in his hands: And that he should be bound to restore them to the Florentines, without any expences or charges, as soone as he had brought to end his enterprise of the kingdome of Naples; the which should be construed to be at an end whensoeuer he should haue conquered the citie of Naples, or accorded the warre by meanes of peace or truce for lesse then two yeares, or that for any other occasion his person should be gone out of Italy: That those that at that time had the keeping of the said Castles, should be sworne to render them in the cases aforesaid: That in the meane while the impery, the iurisdiction, the gouernment, and the reuenue of the townes should be in the administration of the Florentines, as they were accustomed: That the like should be of Pietrasanta, Serezana and Serezanella; but (for that the Genoways pretended right to them) the King should procure either by composition or iustice, some reasonable end between them; and if within the time aforesaid he could not determine the titles, that then he should restore them to the Florentines: That the King might leaue at Florence two Embassadors; and that during his expedition for Naples, there should be nothing debated concerning that action, without their priuitie and calling them to it; and that during the said time, they should not chuse a Captaine generall ouer their companies, without communicating with the said Embassadors: That all the other peeces taken away or reuolted from the Florentines, should be immediatly rendred, and that they might be suffered to recouer them by armes, where deniall was made: That, to aide the King in his enterprise, they should giue him fiftie thousand duckets within fifteene dayes, fortie thousand in the moneth of March, and thirtie thousand in Iune next comming: That the Florentines should pardon the Pisans their rebellions, and other faults committed during their reuolt: That they should deliuer Peter de Medicis and his brethren from condemnation and confiscation, with this condition notwithstanding, that Peter should not come by a hundred miles neare the confines of the dominion of Florence, (that was becausse he should not remaine at Rome) nor his brethren nearer then a hundred miles of the citie of Florence. These were the articles of most importance in the capitulation made betweene the King and the Florentines; which after they were lawfully passed and contracted, were in great ceremonie published in the great Church at diuine Seruice, where the King in person (at whose request this was done) and the Magistrates of the Citie, promised by solemne oath vpon the high altar, in the presence of the Court and the whole face of Florence, to obserue the contents of the same. Within two dayes after the King left Florence, and went to Sienna, which Citie being confederate with the King of Naples, and with the Florentines, had followed their authoritie, vntill the going of Peter de Medicis to Serezana warned them to looke to their proper safetie.

Capitulations betweene the French king and the Florentines.

The French king at Sienna

Sienna a Citie well peopled, and planted in a region very fertill, and which (of antiquitie) had bene the most renowmed and mightie towne of Tuskane next to Florence, was gouerned by a peculiar policie proper and particular to it selfe, but so, as it knew rather the name of libertie then the effects: for that being diuided into many factions or members of Citizens, which they call orders, it obeyed that part which according to the accidents of times and fauours of forrein Potentates, was more strong then the others; at that time held most rule and authoritie the order of Monte-None. After the King had taried a very few dayes at Sienna, he planted a garrison there, (for that hauing bene alwayes at the deuotion of the Empire, he held it suspected) and

tooke his way to Rome, rising euery day more insolent then other, for his successe and fortunes, which were alwayes greater then euer were his hopes: And being also fauoured with the aire and weather, more then the naturall temperature of that season had wont to shew, he determined to put diligence to his fortune, and vse those prosperities not onely as terrible to his enemies manifest and professed, but euen to those that were conioyned with him, or at least had not prouoked him in any thing. Therfore the Senate of Venice and the Duke of Millan, no lesse astonished with these successes, then doubtfull that the Kings thoghts wold not be at rest by the conqueſt of Naples, (specially seeing him possest of the fortresses of the Florentines, and to leaue a garrison at Sienna) began for a remedy of their common danger, to make a new confederatiō; whereunto they had with more speed and ease giuen perfection, if there had bene made that resistance to the King at Rome that was hoped for; the intention of the Duke of Calabria (with whom were ioyned in one strength the bands of the Pope, and Virginio Vrsin, with the residue of the Aragons army) being to incampe at Viterba, to giue impediment to the King for passing further. To this he was drawne, besides many occasions, by the oportunitie of the place, enuironed with townes of the Church, and neare the States of the Vrsins: but all the circumference and countreys about Rome, drawing into tumult by the incursions which the Colonnoys made beyond the riuer of Tiber, and for the impediments of victuals (by meanes of Ostia) which should come to Rome by sea, he durst not abide there: he doubted withall the intention of the Pope, for that since he vnderstood that Peter de Medicis was turned, he had begun to open his eares to the demands of the French, for the which, and the reasons of them, Cardinall Ascanius went to him, after the Cardinall of Valence (in pledge of his suretie) was come to Marina, a towne of the Colonnoys. And albeit Ascanius was gone without resolution certaine, for that Alexander distrusted much the intention of the King, and on the other side was in great feare of his forces, which bred no small torment and conflict in his heart; yet after the King was parted from Florence, they returned eftsoones to commune of the accord: wherein for the better accomplishment of things, the Pope dispatched to the King the Bishops of Concorde, and Ternie, and Maister Gratian his Confessour, with commission that they should compound as well for the affaires of Alphonso, as for his owne. But the King was of a contrary meaning, hauing setled his resolution to accord onely and particularly with the Pope: and for that cause he sent to him Monsieur Trimouille, and the President of Ganuay being there also for the same occasion: the Cardinall Ascanius and Prosper Colonne, who were no sooner come to Rome, then the Pope (for what cause I know not) changing aduice, bestowed the Duke of Calabria within Rome, with all his army, and caused to be arrested Ascanius and Prosper, hauing restrained them within the tower of Adrian, of old called the castle of Crescence, and now named the castle of S. Ange, and demanded of them restitution of Ostia. In this tumult also the French Embassadors were made prisoners by the Aragons: but the Pope caused them with speed to be deliuered, and within a few dayes after restored to libertie Ascanius and Prosper, constraining them notwithstanding to depart suddenly out of Rome. After this, he sent to the French king lying then at Nepi, Cardinall Federike of S. Seuerin, beginning to treate onely of his proper affaires, and yet in great doubt and declining of mind, for that sometimes he determined to stand to the defence of Rome, and therefore gaue sufferance to Ferdinand and the Captaines to looke to fortifie it in the parts most weake; and earst againe, he iudged it a matter very difficult to defend it, for the impediments of victuals restrained by those of Ostia: in which respects, weighing also with the infinite numbers of strangers, being of minds and wils different, the diuersitie of factions euen amongst the Romaines, he began to thinke to go from Rome, requiring in the Colledge that euery Cardinall would promise by a writing subsigned, to follow him: and euen standing amazed with the dangers and difficulties imminent, vpon euery one of his deliberations he turned his mind to accord. But whilest his mind wauered in these ambiguities, the French men forbore not to ouerrunne the whole country on this side Tiber, making themselues Lords of one towne after another, no place offering resistance to their incursions; no, not one peece or fort which gaue not place to their importunate fury, according to the example of the others; no, not such as had good occasion to oppose themselues against them, as Virginio Vrsin, drawne by so many bonds of faith, office, and honor to the house of Aragon, Captaine generall of the army of Alphonso, grand Constable of the realme of Naples, and very neare of kindred to Alphonso, for that Iohn Iordan his sonne had maried a bastard daughter of the late king Ferdinand.

The Pope is iealous of his owne safetie.

But

But he turning all things into forgetfulneſſe, and as vnthankfull for the ſtates and fauours he had receiued in the kingdome of Naples, as vnmindfull that the calamities of the Aragons were firſt kindled for his occaſions, and nouriſhed chiefly in his particular intereſts; conſented that (his perſon continuing ſtill in the pay of the king of Naples) his children ſhould compound with the French, and be bound to giue them paſſage and libertie of victuals and other friendſhips, through all the Eſtates which he held of the dominions of the Church, leauing the French men not a litle amazed with his example and forme of dealing, being not acquainted with theſe ſubtill and vnaccuſtomed diſtinctions of the ſouldiers of Italy: he ſuffered withall that Campagnane and certaine other places were put in deputation into the hands of the Cardinall of Gurcie, who promiſed to reſtore them ſo ſoone as the army was out of the territories of Rome. This forme of agreement was vſed alſo by the Count de Petillane, with all the reſidue of the family of the Vrſins. Immediatly vpon theſe accords, King Charles went from Nepi to Bracciane a chiefe towne of Virginio, and ſent to Oſtia Lewis the Lord of Ligny, and Tues Lord of Alegre, with fiue hundred Lances, and two thouſand Swiſſers, to the end that paſſing Tyber, and ioyning with the Colonnoys, they might make a ſtrength to enter Rome, and that ſo much the better, by how much the Colonnoys (by the meanes of their factions and partakers within Rome) had a reſolute hope to make their entry in what ſort ſoeuer it were, notwithſtanding by the ſeaſon of the time being rough and ſtormy, the difficulties were much increaſed. By this time Ciuitauecche, Cornette, & in the end almoſt all the territories of Rome, were brought to the deuotion of the French, when a man might haue ſeene all the Court amazed, all the Cardinals doubtfull, and all the communaltie of the Citie full of feares and emotion, demanding vehemently peace: inſomuch that the Pope driuen to dangerous termes, ſeeing the foundations which he had laid for his defence, ſhaken on all ſides, was not ſuſtained with any other thing then with the remembrance that he was one of the firſt that ſtirred the French King to the enterpriſe of Naples; and had ſince (without occaſion giuen) obſtinately reſiſted him with authoritie, with counſels, and with force: the ſame making him iuſtly doubt, that the faith which he ſhould receiue of the King, ſhould be like that the King had receiued of him. To theſe feares he felt another torment nothing inferior, vnderſtanding the Cardinall S. Peter ad Vincula was very gracious in the Kings ſight, with many other Cardinals his enemies, bearing no litle authoritie and rule in the Kings doings; by the perſwaſions of whom, and for the regard of the title of Right Chriſtian, which the Kings of France beare, and for the ancient name which that nation hath to be very religious; and laſtly for that in ill men the conſcience guiltie and infected ſuſpecteth not onely the worſt, but alſo their minds carried in ſhadowes, they expect and dread great things of thoſe that are knowne to them by name onely; he feared leſt the King would turne his wits (according to a vaine brute) to reforme the gouernment of the Church: the ſame being a right trembling thought and conieƈture to him, when he remembred with what infamy he was come to the Popedome, performing his miniſtration with manners of life and meanes not differing from ſo foule and vile a beginning. But he was cleared immediatly of theſe ſuſpitions by the diligence and promiſes of the King, full of efficacie and deſire to aduance aboue all things his going to the Realme of Naples: and for that cauſe letting nothing paſſe that might take out of the way the blockes and impediments of the Pope, ſent to him eſtſoones as Embaſſadours, the Seneſhall of Beucaire, the Marſhall of Giè, and the ſaid Preſident of Gannay. They laboured to perſwade the Pope that the Kings intention was not to meddle with any thing that appertained to the authoritie of Popes; and that his demands ſtretched not but to things reaſonable and neceſſary for the ſuretie of his paſſage. They required him inſtantly to agree with good will to the Kings entry into Rome, aſſuring him that it was a holy and peculiar deſire in his Maieſtie (not that it was not in his power to make his entry by armes, but becauſe he would not be conſtrained to forbeare) to vſe thoſe actions of reuerence, which had bene alwayes done by his elders to the Popes of Rome: They aſſured him that as ſoone as his Maieſties perſon were poſſeſſed of the preſence of the Pope within Rome, all thoſe quarrels that had bene raiſed betweene them, would be conuerted into reconcilement, vnitie and coniunction. It ſeemed to the Pope a hard compulſion, to deſpoile himſelfe afore all things of the aide of his friends, and committing his eſtate and life into the power of an enemie, to receiue him within the wals of Rome afore he had compounded or aſſured his affaires: notwithſtanding, making election of the danger that was of leaſt qualitie, he conſented to all their demands, and cauſed to depart out of Rome the Duke of Calabria, for whom albeit he obtained of the French King a safe conduct for his safe passage through all the dominions of the Church, yet the Duke accounting it a diminution of his reputation and courage, refused it, and issued out of Rome by the gate S. Sebastian, the last day of the yeare 1494. at the same houre that at the gate de S. Maria de Popolo entred with the army of France the French king armed, with his Lance vpon his thigh, as he entred Florence. At the same time the Pope full of incredible feares and perplexities, was withdrawne to the castle S. Ange, not accompanied with other Cardinals then Baptista Vrsin, and Oliuer Caraffa a Neapolitan. But now began the Cardinals, ad Vincula, Ascanius, Colonne and Sauelle, with many others, to solicite the King with vehement instance, that taking from the Sea a Pope full of vices, and abhominable to all the world, he would create and set vp another: they told him, it would be no lesse vertuous in him to deliuer the Church of God from the tyrannie of a wicked Pope, then it was great glory to Pepin and Charlemaine his predecessors, to take the Popes of holy life out of the persecutions of those that did vniustly oppresse them: That the action was no lesse necessary for his securitie, then greatly concurring for his glory: for, there was no expectation of faith or trust in the promises of the Pope, being a man naturally full of fraud, insatiable in ambition, shameless in all his doings, and according to the testimonie of experience, extremely hating the French, with whom the reconciliation that now he made, was more by necessitie and feare, then of inclination or good wil. Partly by these perswasions, and partly for that the Pope in the conditions that were debated, refused to let the King haue the castle of S. Ange, for the suretie of those things he promised him; the artillery was drawn twice from the Pallace of S. Mark where the King was lodged, to be planted before the castle. But the King bearing no inclination to offend the Pope, the presents and promises of Alexander working much with those that gouerned most the kings counsels, they fell to accord in this sort: That there should be betweene the Pope and the King a perpetuall amitie and confederation for their common defence: That the Pope should giue to the King, to hold for his suretie till he had conquered the kingdome of Naples, the Citadels of Ciuitauecchia, Terracine, and Spolete, and yet this last was not put into his hands: That the Pope should keepe no remembrance of any offence or iniury of the Cardinals or any Barons subiects to the Church, that had followed the Kings partie: That the Pope should inuest him in the kingdome of Naples: That he should giue to the King Gemin Ottoman, brother to Baiazet, who after the death of their father, had bene persecuted by the said Baiazet, according to the barbarous customes of the Ottomans, seeking to establish their succession in the Empire, with the bloud of their brethren, their neerest kinne and competitors; in which perill for safetie of his life he was fled to Rhodes, from whence he was brought into France, and lastly past ouer into the power and custodie of Pope Innocent: by which occasion Bazazet (seruing his turne of the couetousnesse of the Vicars of Christ, as instruments to hold in peace the Empire enemy to the Christian faith) payed euery yeare (vnder the name of allowance toward his maintenance and keeping) fortie thousand duckets to the Popes, to the end they should be lesse ready to deliuer him into the hands of other Princes to serue their turnes against him. The King was so much the more desirous to haue him, by how much he supposed to turne him to many vses and oportunities for the aduancing of his pretended enterprise against the Turkes, (being greatly carried into glory by the vaine flatteries of many of his fauourites) which he meant to begin as soone as he had accomplished the conquest of the Aragons: and because the last fortie thousand duckats sent by the Turke, were taken at Sinigalle by the Prefect Rome, he required that the Pope would remit both the punishment and restitution. To these capitulations were added, that the Cardinall of Valence should follow the King three moneths as Legate Apostolike, but in meaning, it was to stand as hostage for the promises of his father. The accord thus made and past, the Pope returned to the Vatican, where is his Pallace Pontificall: and after, with pompes and ceremonies accustomed at the receiuing of great Kings, he receiued the King in the Church of S. Peter, and there (according to the maner) hauing kissed his feete kneeling, was afterward receiued to kisse his cheek. Another day he assisted in presence the Popes Masse, where he had his place the first after the first Bishop Cardinal, and according to the ancient custome, gaue water to the Pope celebrating Masse: which offices, humilities and ceremonies, the Pope (to continue the memory to all posterities) caused to be curiously drawne in a table pourtrayed, and hung vp in a gallerie of the Castle S. Ange. In this action, the Pope to gratifie the King, created and published Cardinals the Bishop of S. Malo, and the Bishop of Mans, of the house of Luxemburg, burg, forgetting nothing that might expresse how sincerely and vnfainedly he was reconciled.

The King parteth frō Rome and draweth towards Naples.

The King remaining in Rome about a moneth, forgat not to send bands and troupes of souldiers euen vpon the confines of the kingdome of Naples: where was already such generall commotion, that Aquila and almost all Abruzza displayed ensignes afore he parted from Rome, as also Fabricius Colonne occupied the quarters of Albe and Taille Cosse. The residue of the whole kingdome was almost in no more peaceable estate, for that as soone as Ferdinand was parted from Rome, the fruites of the hatreds which the people had long borne to Alphonso, began to appeare, helping much the remembrance of many rigors which his father Ferdinand had vsed against them. Vpon these they raised ready occasions to complaine vehemently of the iniquities of the gouernments passed, together with the cruelties and pride of Alphonso, expressing in these humors apparent desire that the French might come. And that in such sort, as the contemplation of the ancient relikes and monuments of such as held with the house of Anioy, albeit they were ioyned to the memory of so many Barons as had bene chased and imprisoned at sundry times by Ferdinand, (things of themselues of great consideration, and of no litle power to worke a change) did litle in this time, in regard of the other occasions: so vehemently were the hearts of all the kingdome inflamed against Alphonso; who for his part, as soone as he vnderstood that his sonne was gone out of Rome, entred into such present feares and astonishments, that turning all memory or regard to the great renowne and glorie which with so long experience he had got in many warres in Italy, into a present despaire, not to be able to resist this fatall storme, he determined to abandon the kingdome, and leaue to Ferdinand the name and authoritie royall. In this deuice perhaps he had hope, that taking away with himselfe the generall hatred, and leauing to the people for their King a yong Prince of great expectation, not yet hauing offended any of them, but gracious and plausible to the vniuersall multitude, he should make lesse in his subiects their desire to haue the French. Which counsell, if it had bene sooner taken, would haply haue wrought to better purpose; but being deferred till things were not onely in motion and shaking, but euen beginning to fall, it was not able to stay so great a ruine. It was said also (if it be lawfull not to despise such things altogether) that the spirit of Ferdinand appeared three times in sundry nights to Iames chiefe Surgeon of the Court, charging him first with soft and milde words, and after with many threatnings, to warne Alphonso from him, not to hope to be able to resist the French king, because it was a resolution in destinie, that his race trauelled with infinite aduentures and fortunes, and depriued at last of so large a kingdome, should now end and determine. He said, their enormities began now to appeare in iustice; and the many tyrannies by them committed were the causes, but aboue all others that which by his perswasion he had done in the Church of S. Leonard in Chiaia neare Naples, comming from Pazzolo; and for that he expressed them not particularly, men supposed that Alphonso had in that place perswaded Ferdinand to put to death secretly many Barons, whom he held prisoners long time before. But of what nature soeuer the occasion was, it is most certaine that Alphonso vexed with his owne conscience, liued day and night in a discontented spirit, for that in his sleepes the shadowes and ghosts of those dead Lords were liuely afore him, and on the dayes he beheld the people prepared greatly to insurrections, for reuenge of his rigorous dealings. In which perplexitie of mind applying his counsels to his fortunes, he communicated onely his intention with the Queene his mother in law, keeping it from his brother or his sons; and departed from Naples accompanied with foure light gallies loaden with implements rich and precious: he was so afflicted with dread and confusion, that at the earnest instance of his mother, he would not stay two or three dayes (to end the whole yeare of his reigne,) and at his departure expressing some timorous disposition of mind, as if he had bene enuironed with the French men: he sailed to a towne in Sicile called Mazare, which Ferdinand the king of Spaine had giuen him the yeare before: but his feares left not to follow him no more then his fortunes, shewing at euery brute or small noise, no lesse perplexitie and terror, then if the heauens and elements had conspired against him.

The kingdome of Naples beginneth to conspire.

As the French King departed out of Rome, he receiued aduertisement of the flying of Alphonso; and as soone as he was arriued at Vellitre, the Cardinall of Valence fled secretly from him: with the which albeit the Pope shewed himselfe much discontented, offering to giue the King such assurance as it pleased him; yet wise men beleeued that it was not without his practise and commandement, as one that sought to haue in his power to obserue or not obserue the agreements he had made with his Maieſtie: an action agreeing with his ambition, which no ſo gouerned him, but far from the office of his profeſſion, which he leaſt eſteemed, making nothing vnlawful, for that he challenged to himſelf to haue power to diſpenſe with all things. From Velletri the vantguard marched to Montfortin, a towne of the Church ſeated in the plaine countrey, ſubiect to Iaques a Romaine gentleman, who had at firſt followed the pay of the French King, but ſince (the hate he bare to the Colonnoys prenailing more with him then his proper honour) he became mercenary to Alphonſo: and after the place was well ſhaken with the artillery, it was taken (notwithſtanding the ſtrong ſituation) within few houres by the French, who put to the ſword all that were found within it, except his three ſonnes, and certaine others, who being retired into the Caſtle, yeelded themſelues priſoners as ſoone as they ſaw the artillery planted. From thence the army marched to Mount S. John, a towne of the Marqueſſe of Peſcaire, ſeated in the ſame plaine, vpon the confines of the kingdome: which beſides that it was ſtrong by nature and induſtry of men, was alſo well furniſhed with ſouldiers to defend it; hauing in it three hundred footmen ſtrangers, and fiue hundred of the inhabitants well appointed for all dangers: ſo that it was not thought pregnable, but by a hard and long ſiege. But after the French men had ſomewhat battered the walls with their Cannons, they gaue in the preſence of the King (then come from Verule) ſo hot and violent an aſſault, that vanquiſhing all difficulties, they tooke it by force the ſame day. And following their naturall fury, as alſo to warne others by this example, not to be ſo obſtinate as to reſiſt, hauing made lamentable ſlaughters, without ſparing any ſort of barbarous crueltie, they ſet the houſes on fire: which maner of making warre, not vſed in Italy in many ages before, filled the whole Realme with great feares and terrors. For in Italy in all victories obtained in what ſort ſoeuer, the moſt extreme and laſt action wherein the Victor would ſtretch out his crueltie, was to diſarme the ſouldiers, and ſo let them go vanquiſhed: and for townes taken by force, to put them to ſacke and pillage, and the inhabitants to ranſome, pardoning alwayes the life of men not ſlaine in the heate and fury of the fight.

This was all the reſiſtance and paines which the French King had to conquer ſo noble and populous a kingdome: for the defence whereof, there was not ſhewed in any ſort any vertue, any counſell, any faith, nor any deſire of honor. For, after that the Duke of Calabria (who after his going out of Rome, was retired to the borders of the kingdome) being called to Naples, by the flying of his father, had taken vpon him the authoritie and title of King, with the ſolemnities accuſtomed, (but without any pompe) and that he had aſſembled his army containing fiftie ſquadrons of horſemen, and ſixe thouſand footmen of choiſe, led by the beſt reputed Captaines in Italy; he encamped himſelfe at S. Germain, to ſtop the enemy for paſſing further, being drawne thither by the oportunitie of the place, enuironed on the one ſide with high and rough mountaines, and on the other with a countrey full of mariſhes and waters, and had in the front the riuer of Garillan, which the Ancients called Liri, albeit it was not ſo deepe in that place, but at ſome times it was paſſable at a foord; by reaſon whereof, and that the paſſage is very narrow and ſtraight, they ſay (with good reaſon) that S. Germain is one of the keys of the kingdome of Naples. He ſent alſo bands and troupes to the next mountaines, to keepe the way of Capella. But his army being already terrified with the onely name of the French, ſhewed no more tokens of courage; and the Captaines partly tendring the ſafetie of themſelues and their owne eſtates, diſtruſting already of the defence of the kingdome, and partly deſiring innouations, began to wauer no leſſe in faith then in courage: and laſtly, all the kingdome being in inſurrection, it was not without feare that at their backes ſhould happen ſome perilous diſorder. Therefore counſell giuing place to cowardize, vnderſtanding after the taking of Mount S. John, that the Marſhall de Gié was at hand with three hundred lances and two thouſand footmen; they diſcamped with ſhame from S. Germain, and retired to Capua with ſuch confuſion and feare, that they left by the way eight great peeces of artillery without guard, giuing the enemy a meanes to helpe forward their deſtruction with their owne weapons. This Citie, the new King (repoſing much in the amitie of the Towne towards the houſe of Aragon, and in the ſtrong ſeate of the place) hoped to defend, and to keepe alſo Naples and Caietta, not making diſtribution of his forces to other places. The French men went after; but diſperſed and out of order, marching more after the maner of trauellers then like men of warre, and without all regard either to keepe vnder their enſignes, or to be ruled by the direction of their Captaines, they tooke libertie to go where ſoeuer they thought to find pillage; and one part of them moſt often lodged in the nights in places where the Aragins were dislodged in the mornings. Neither in Capua was any greater demonstration of vertue or fortune, for that after Ferdinand had there bestowed his army, much diminished in numbers since the retrait from S. Germain, he was sent for by letters from the Queene, expressing that since the losse of S. Germain, there were such murmures and mutinies within Naples, as without his presence, there was manifest danger of a generall tumult: for which cause he went thither with a small companie, by his presence to giue impediment to the perill present, promising to returne eftsoones to Capua the day following. But Iohn Iaques Triuulce, to whom he had left the guard of the Citie, had secretly sent to the French King for a Herald, to come vnder suretie to speake with him; which being granted, Triuulce with certaine gentlemen of Capua, went to Calui, where the same day the King was entred. This did Triuulce notwithstanding that many others of the Citie well disposed to keepe their faith to Ferdinand, did speake against it with many braue and haughtie words: but being presented to the King all armed as he came in, he told him in the name of the Capuans and souldiers; That they seeing their forces to defend, to faile in Ferdinand, whom they had faithfully serued whilest there remained any apparence of hope, were now come to make offer of their seruices to him, bringing minds to follow his fortunes whereseoeuer he will employ them, vnder honest conditions; adding withall, that he doubted not to bring him Ferdinand himselfe, so that he would entertaine and acknowledge him as appertained. The King made him this gracious answer, That he accepted the offers of the Capuans and souldiers; as also the coming of Ferdinand should be no lesse welcome: onely that he should retaine no portion of the kingdome of Naples how litle soeuer it were, but that he should endue him with estates and honors in the Realme of France.

Iohn Iaques Triuulce goeth to the French king.

It may be doubted what moued Triuulce, being a valiant Captaine, and one that made profession of honor, to reuolt, and leaue his King. Touching himselfe, he affirmed that he went by the direction of Ferdinand to solicite some composition with the French; and being out of all hope to preuaile, and seeing that the kingdome of Naples could be no longer defended by armes, he thought it not onely lawfull, but also allowable to prouide at one time for the safetie of the Capuans, and securitie of the souldiers. But the common opinion of men was otherwise: for they referre his reuolt to a desire he had that the French King might be Victor; for that he hoped when he had made a conquest of Naples, he would looke into the meanes by the which he might in like sort make himselfe maister of Millan: in which Citie, he being borne of a most noble family, and because for the prime fauours which the house of S. Seuerin had with Lodewike Sforce, and with other occasions, he had not place according to his vertues and merites; he was wholly estranged from Lodewike. For those occasions many wise men iudged that he had counselled Ferdinand to proceed in the actions and seruice of Romagnia, more temperately then perhaps the occasions required. But in Capua, afore the returne of Triuulce, the souldiers had sacked the Pallace, armories, and stables of Ferdinand, the men at armes made diuisions of them selues, and were bestowed in sundry quarters; and Virginio and the Count Petillane were retired with their companies to the Citie of Nola, belonging to the said Count by the donation of the Aragons, sending first to the French King to demand safe conduct for them and their people. Ferdinand returned according to his promise, hauing somewhat appeased (according to the time) the humors of the Neapolitans, by giuing them hope of the defence of Capua; and he was come within two miles of the Citie, all ignorant of the change that happened since his departure: but the Towne hearing of his returne, the people wholly exclamed against his re-entry, drew into armes, and by a common voice and counsell sent forth to meete him certaine of the Nobilitie, to aduertise him to passe no further; for that the Citie, seeing he had left it abandoned, that Triuulce gouernour of the men of warre was gone to the French, his owne souldiers had made a spoile of his pallace, and Virginio and the Count Petillane had left them to their fortunes, and that almost all his army was broken; they were constrained for their owne safetie to giue place to the Conqueror. With these newes, no lesse heauie then troublesome, Ferdinand (after he had made vaine instance eueft with teares to be receiued) returnes to Naples, being wel assured that the example of Capua would draw the residue of the kingdome to reuolt; whereby the Citie of Auerse, seated betweene Capua and Naples, was moued to dispatch present Embassadors to offer themselues to the French King: and the Neapolitans consulting also manifestly to do the like, the infortunate King determined not to resist so sodaine a violence of fortune; and therefore assembling vpon the place of the new Castle, being the Kings seate, many of the Nobi-

Nobilitie and people, he deliuered to them this laſt and lamentable ſpeech:

I may call God to witnes, and the conſciences of all thoſe men that heretofore haue had any information of my thoughts & conceits, that no deſire made me more to aſpire to the Crown, then to expreſſe to the world with what griefe I miſliked the rigorous gouernments of my father and grandfather, and to reclaime by moderation and benefites thoſe hearts and affections which they had loſt by their hard dealing and crueltie: but the infelicitie of our houſe would neuer ſuffer that I ſhould receiue this fruit, which I eſteem more excellent and honorable then the kingdome it ſelfe: ſeeing that to be a King, is a thing that oftentimes depends vpon fortune; but to be ſuch a King as to turne all his thoughts to the welfare and felicitie of his people, that depends onely of himſelfe and his proper vertue. Now I ſee our affaires ſuffer hard fortunes, and the extremity wherein they are fallen, is of that nature, that we may complaine more to haue loſt the kingdome by the infidelitie and feares of our armies and Captaines, then our enemies can vaunt to haue wonne it by their proper vertue: and yet our fortune leaueth vs not altogether without hope, if we ſuſtain yet a litle time, for that both by the King of Spaine and all the Princes of Italy, is preparing a mightie ſuccor, their eyes being now opened that afore could not conſider, that the fire which burnes our Realme, muſt in like ſort (without prouidence) caſt his flames into their ſeuerall Eſtates. And for me, at the leaſt, courage ſhould not want to determine together the kingdome and my life, both with that glory which becomes a yong King deſcended by ſo long ſucceſſion of ſo many Kings, and alſo anſwering the expectation which hitherunto you haue had of my merits and vertues. But becauſe things cannot be put to triall, without committing the cõmon patrimony to deſperate perill, I am determined rather to giue place to fortune, and keepe hid my vertue, then in ſtriuing not to loſe the kingdom, to be the cauſer of effects contrary to thoſe ends for the which I haue deſired to be king. Therefore with teares I giue you this counſell, that ſtanding no more againſt the fury of the time, you ſend with ſpeed to make your accord with the French king. And to the end you may be in better power, to do it without ſtaine to your honors, I abſolue you willingly of the homage and oath which you made to me a few daies paſt: wherein I exhort you according to the neceſſitie of your fortune, not to deferre your obedience, humilitie and readineſſe to receiue him, as by that meanes to ſtay the courſe of your owne aduerſities, and helpe to moderate the naturall pride of that nation. If at any time their barbarous cuſtomes and manners cauſe you to hate their rule and impery, and deſire my return, I will remaine in place apt to miniſter aid to your will, and be ready to offer vp my life for the redreſſe of your oppreſſions and harmes. But if their gouernment content you, this Realme ſhall neuer receiue vexation or trauell by me, your well doing & benefit ſeruing as a perpetuall conſolation to my miſeries; and that ſo much the rather, if I may know that there remaine in you any memory, that neither in the perſon of an eldeſt ſon to a King, nor in the power of a King, I haue done no wrong to any creature. My thoughts were neuer ſubiect to motions of ambition, my mind neuer defiled with inclination to crueltie, mine owne ſins bring me not this affliction, but by a diuine iuſtice I ſuffer for the wickednes of my parents. I am determined not to be the cauſe, that either to preſerue the Realme, or to recouer it, any ſubiect of the ſame be oppreſſed: No, it is more ſorow to me to loſe the meanes to make amends for the tranſgreſſions of my parents, then to forgo the royall dignitie and kingdome it ſelfe: for, albeit I ſhall be eſtranged from you, and baniſhed from my patrimony, yet I wil not hold my ſelfe altogether wretched, if to the memory of theſe things, you ioyne a ſtedfaſt beliefe, that I wold haue bin King rather like to old Alphonſo my great grandfather, then to Ferdinand, or the laſt Alphonſo. It cannot be that theſe words were deliuered without great compaſſion: but albeit they wrought many ſorowfull impreſſions in the hearts of the hearers, yet it did nothing to the ſtay of the tumult, ſo hatefull was the name of the two laſt Kings to the people, and ſo ſweet the deſire of the French gouernment to the Nobilitie. He was no ſooner retired into the Caſtle, then the multitude began to ſacke his pauilions and tents then pitched in the place: which being an indignitie far vnworthy his merits, and more then he could endure, he returned with great courage to the place to driue them from the ſpoile, the maieſtie and preſence of a King being yet of ſuch authoritie in a citie rebelled, that the ſouldiers reſtraining their fury, euery one abſtained from pillage: but as ſoone as he was returned to the Caſtle, and had ſet on fire and ſunk moſt of the ſhips in the hauen, (hauing no other way to depriue the enemy of them) he began by tokens certain to doubt that the Lance-knights, which were the guard of the caſtle, containing in number fiue hundred, conſpired to take him priſoner;

The yong king Ferdinand ſpeaks in great ſorow to the multitude.

and therefore the danger being preſent, he vſed this ſodain counſel, to giue them his wardrobes, goods and furnitures that were within the Caſtle; and whileſt they were buſie to diuide and ſhare them, he ſlipt out of the caſtle by the gate of ſuccors, deliuering firſt out of priſon all thoſe Barons that had bin reſtrained by the crueltie of his father: he mounted vpon the light gallies that attended him in the hauen, accompanied with Dom Federike, and the old Queene wife to his grandfather, who carried with her Iane her daughter; and being followed with very few of his people, he ſailed into the Ile of Iſchia, called by the ancients Enaria, diſtant thirtie miles from Naples. On his way, ſo long as his eyes were fed with the proſpect and ſight of the kingdome, he made many repetitions with a pitifull voice, of this verſe of the Pſalme, That they watch in vaine which keepe the citie, if it be not kept by the Lord. But finding now no more comfort of fortune, then when he was amidſt the dangers of Naples, it fell to him to make triall of his vertue in Iſchia, together with an experience of the ingratitude and infidelity of ſuch as riſe vp againſt thoſe wretched perſons that are perſecuted by fortune: for the caſtle-keeper of the place refuſing to receiue him but with one man onely, when he was within, he fell vpon him with ſuch fury, that what by his agilitie and valour, and the impreſſion of a King and maieſty royall, he brought immediatly vnder his power both the caſtle and the keeper. After Ferdinand was gone out of Naples, euery one gaue way (as to a violent land-floud) to the onely name and renowne of the victors, and that with ſuch cowardize, that two hundred horſemen of Monſieur de Lignies went to Nola, whither Virginio and the Count Petillane were retired with foure hundred men at armes, and tooke them priſoners without reſiſtance: either they had confidence in the ſafe conduct that was granted them, or elſe their feares were no leſſe then the others, ſeeing without triall or ſhew of valour, they ſuffered themſelues to be led captiues to the rocke of Mondragon, and all their companies to be ſtripped. In this meane while, the Embaſſadors whom the Neapolitans had ſent to preſent to the French king the keyes of the Citie, found him at Auerſe, from whence after he had accorded to them with great liberalities, many priuiledges and exemptions, he went to Naples, and made his entry the xxj. of February: he was receiued with generall reioycing of all ſorts, no perſon of any ſexe, age, condition, qualitie, nor faction, ſparing to runne to behold him, as if he had bene their patron and firſt founder of the Citie: yea, there was a plentifull and willing preſence of thoſe, who either in themſelues, or in their anceſtors, had bin raiſed to honors and eſtates by the houſe of Aragon. With this affluence and concourſe of people, after he had viſited the great Church, he was led (becauſe the new caſtle was yet kept by the enemies) to be lodged in the caſtle of Capua, the ancient habitation and reſidence of the Kings of France; hauing with a wonderfull courſe of felicitie, farre aboue the example of Iulius Ceſar, rather vanquiſhed then ſeene his enemy, and that with ſo ready fortune and facilitie, that during the whole expedition, he neuer had need to diſplay one pauilion or tent, and much leſſe to breake a lance: and touching his prouiſions, he had ſo great plentie and ſuperfluitie, that his army at ſea prepared with ſo great expences, being caried by violence of weather into the Ile of Corſica, was ſo long in approching the ſhores of the kingdome, that the King had accompliſhed his conqueſt afore their arriuall.

The French king entereth Naples.

Thus by ciuill diſcords which ſo long had blinded the notable wiſedome of the Princes of Italy, to the great diſhonor and ſcorne of the men of warre of that nation, and common danger and ignominy of euery region of the ſame, was transferred one of the moſt goodly and mighty parts of Italy, from the Empery of Italy to the Empery and gouernment of a nation beyond the mounts: for, albeit old Ferdinand was borne in Spaine, yet, for that from his youth he had his training in Italy, either King, or the ſonne of a King, and holding no other principalitie elſewhere, where together that his ſonnes and ſonnes ſonnes were bred vp in Naples, they were by good right reputed Italians.

THE SECOND BOOKE OF THE historie and diſcourſe of Guicciardin.

THE ARGVMENT.

THE Piſans continue their rebellion againſt the Florentines: The French King takes the caſtles of Naples: The Pope, the Venetians and other Princes make league againſt the King, who returning into France, is fought withall neare the riuer Taro. Ferdinand winnes againe Naples. Nouara is beſieged by the Confederates. The King makes peace with the Duke of Millan, and returnes into France.

WHileſt things went in this courſe at Rome and the kingdome of Naples, there kindled in another part of Italy ſparks of a litle fire, wherein was nouriſhed a ſmothering heate, ordained to burſt out to a great burning, to the hurt of many, but ſpecially to the ruine of him, who, by too great a deſire of dominion and rule, firſt kindled it and ſet it on flame. For, albeit the King was bound by the contract of Florence, that Piſa remaining in his hands till he had conquered the Realme of Naples, the iuriſdiction and reuenues ſhould be adminiſtred by the Florentines; yet, at his departure, he had ſet no order for the execution of his word and promiſe: inſomuch that the Piſans (preſuming much of the Captaines and ſouldiers left by the King for the guard of the Citie) determined no more to returne to the obedience of Florence, but expulſed their officers and others that ſolicited there for the Citie, and made the reſidue priſoners, with confiſcation of all their goods; and fully confirmed their rebellion, both by demonſtrations and actions. In this reuolt, to be the better able to continue it, they not onely diſpatched Embaſſadors to the King, to pray him of defence and protection to their doings, but alſo (for their ſtay and ſtrength more aſſured) they recommended their cauſe to the cities of Sienna and Lucques, who being ancient enemies to the name of Florence, could heare of nothing more to their liking then the reuolt of the Piſans; and therefore they ſent them forthwith in a cõmon proportion of mony, and Sienna apart furniſhed them with an aid of horſemen. In like ſort the Piſans ſent Embaſſadors to Veniee, to ſound the will of that Senate; of whom albeit they were graciouſly receiued, yet they brought away nothing but hopes doubtfull and vncertaine. But they repoſed their chiefeſt confidence in the Duke of Millan, for that as he was the firſt breeder of their rebellion, ſo they hoped he would not faile to ſupport them. The Duke, albeit he made other ſhewes and demonſtrations to the Florentines, yet he tooke care ſecretly for the confirmation of this reuolt, breathing courage into them with many offers and perſwaſions, and dealt vnderhand with the Genoways, to furniſh the Piſans with armor and munitions, and to ſend to them a commiſſioner, with three hundred footmen. There hath bin ancient quarell betweene the Florentines and Genoways, riſing at firſt by the conqueſt of Piſa, and continued by many degrees of diſpleaſures, both for buying the port of Liuorne of their Duke Thomaſin Fregoſa, which they poſſeſſed, and alſo the taking away of Pietraſanta and Serezana. The memory of theſe, ioyned to the occaſion offered, was ſufficient to arme them with a wonderfull readineſſe to do all things that might annoy the Florentines; occupying euen already many of their places in the countrey of Lunigiana, and were become Lords of the borders of Pietraſanta, vnder colour of a letter obtained from the French King for the reſtitution of certaine goods confiſked. The Florentines complaining of theſe actions at Millan, were anſwered by the Duke, that according to the capitulations which he had with them of Genes, he could not well do any thing to reſtraine them: and labouring to content them with words and diuerſitie

ſitie of hopes, he forbare not to practiſe the quite contrary, as one that nouriſhed an ambitious expectation to draw Piſa to his obedience, if the Florentines did not eſtſoones recouer it; a thing much deſired by him, no leſſe for the qualitie of the Citie, then oportunitie of the ſituation. Neither was this deſire new, but had bene nouriſhed in him euer ſince he was expulſed Millan, a litle after the death of Galeas his brother, for a iealouſie which the Lady Bonne (mother and tutor to the litle Duke) had of him; and confined for many moneths vnto the citie of Piſa. He was further ſtirred vp by the memory, that Piſa (afore it came into the iuriſdiction of the Florentines) had bene poſſeſſed by John Galeas Viſcount, firſt Duke of Millan: by reaſon whereof, he thought it would be an increaſe of his glory, to recouer that which had bene poſſeſſed by his anceſtors, and iudged that he might pretend a colour of right, in not making it lawfull for John Galeas to leaue by teſtament (to the preiudice of the Dukes of Millan his ſucceſſors) to Gabriel Maria his baſtard ſonne, the State of Piſa, which he had gotten, albeit with the treaſures and forces of the Duchie of Millan. And the Piſans, not content to haue drawne their Citie from the obedience of the Florentines, ſought to obtrude vpon all the places and peeces of the generall demaine; all which for the moſt part (as the manner of the countrey is) followed the authoritie of the Citie, and receiued their commiſſioners, euen in the firſt daies of the rebellion; the Florentines making no reſiſtance in the beginning, for that they were otherwiſe buſied in affaires of greater importance, not hauing as yet compoſed with the French King, and did perhaps expect that he would apply remedy to thoſe harmes, according to his bond, proteſted by publike and ſolemne oath. But perceiuing that he deferred to giue order, they ſent their bands and companies, who eſtſoones recouered partly by force, and partly by compoſition, all that was occupied, except Caſine, Buti and Vicopiſan, into which places the Piſans (being not ſtrong enough to make reſiſtance on all ſides) had withdrawne their forces. Touching the King, the doings of the Piſans did nothing diſpleaſe him, their cauſe being apparently fauoured by many of his Court, ſome of them being induced by a compaſſion, that they had bene ſtraightly gouerned by the Florentines; others to the end to oppoſe themſelues againſt the Cardinall of S. Malo, being wholly for the Florentines: of theſe was principall the Seneſhall of Beaucaire, with whom the money of the Piſans had much preuailed, but much more the diſcontentment he had for the greatneſſe of the Cardinall, from whom (according to the variations of Court) he began to be eſtranged and ſeparate, being moued with the ſelfe ſame ambition to embaſe him, with the which he had raiſed him in the beginning. Theſe men not hauing reſpect to that which concerned the honor & promiſed faith of ſo great a King, perſwaded that it agreed beſt with the profit and eſtate of his other enterpriſes, to keepe the Florentines in this neceſſitie, and not to moderate the doings of the Piſans, at the leaſt till he had conquered the Realme of Naples. The King carried with theſe perſwaſions, framed himſelfe to entertaine both the one and the other partie with ſeuerall hopes; and therefore whileſt he remained at Rome, he called for the Embaſſadors of Florence to heare in his preſence the complaints made to him by the Piſans, for whom ſpake Burgundio Loli Citizen of Piſa, and aduocate of the Conſiſtory in the Court of Rome: He complained bitterly, that the Piſans had bene holden foure ſcore yeares in ſuch an vniuſt and cruell ſeruitude, that that Citie, which with many honorable victories heretofore had ſtretched out her iuriſdiction euen to the parts of Leuant, and had bin alwayes one of the moſt mightie and glorious members of all Italy, was now by the ſeueritie and couetouſneſſe of the Florentins, come to her laſt deſolation: That the towne of Piſa was almoſt made naked of inhabitants, for that the moſt part of the naturall and free borne Citizens, not able to beare ſo heauie a yoke, had willingly abandoned it, whoſe counſell hath bene proued wiſe by the miſeries of others, whom the loue of their countrey hath retained; who by reaſon of the great exactions of the Magiſtrates, and inſolent robberies of priuate perſons of Florence, were diſpoyled almoſt of all their ſubſtance, hauing no meanes left to maintaine themſelues, for that with a tyrannie and iniuſtice ſtrange and barbarous, they were forbidden to manage trades of merchandize, or to excerciſe any art except of the hand; and were not admitted into any office of qualitie, nor in the adminiſtration of the gouernment of Florence, no not in things which were transferred to ſtrangers: That the Florentines exerciſed all ſorts of crueltie againſt their health and their liues; and to haue a more ready way to their generall deſtruction, they haue of late yeares ſhaked off an ancient and neceſſary care to preſerue the banks and cauſſeys of the country of Piſa, maintained alwayes from age to age by the Lords of that country country with no ſmall ſtudy, for that otherwiſe it was impoſſible (ſeeing the ſhallowneſſe of the country, ſubiect to inundations and water-flouds) that they ſhould not be euery yeare ſtricken with diuerſitie of diſeaſes: that by this decay, were made ruinate euen flat with the earth, Churches, Pallaces, with many honorable buildings both publike and priuate, erected by their predeceſſors, with no litle expence and charge: That it was no ſhame to famous Cities or townes, if, after the courſe of many ages they fell into ſeruitude, for that all mortall things by deſtiny are ſubiect to corruption: but that the memory of their nobilitie and greatnes, ought to breed in the ſpirits of conquerors more compaſſion then rigor; eſpecially euery one hauing to conſider, that it is not onely in the power of time, but alſo incident to the iuſt courſe and deſtiny of earthly things, to bring vpon them the ſelfeſame end which is ordained to happen to all other cities and Empires: That if the Piſans there reſted no more, wherein the inhumanitie and inſatiable couetouſneſſe of the Florentines could be exerciſed with further ſcope; and therefore the yoke of thoſe burdens bearing a weight aboue their ſtrength, and the varietie of their miſeries ſo infinite and intolletable, they had with one mind determined, rather to abandon their country, and to giue vp their liues, then to returne eſtſoones vnder ſo vniuſt and ſo tyrannous a gouernment: Beſeeching laſtly the King with teares (which he beſought him to imagine to be the plentifull teares of the whole people of Piſa miſerably proſtrate at his feet) to remember, that with the ſame pietie and with the ſame iuſtice, he had reſtored them to that libertie, of the which they had bin ſo vniuſtly diſpoiled; he would eſtſoones as a Prince reſolute and conſtant, defend and keepe them in the ſame benefite, chuſing rather to beare the name of the father and defender of this Citie ſo ancient and innocent, then in redeliuering it vp into a ſeruitude ſo wretched, to become the infamous miniſter of the robberies, oppreſſions and tyrannies of the Florentines. To theſe accuſations anſwered, with no leſſe vehemency, Francis Soderin Biſhop of Volterre, afterwards made Cardinall, and at that time one of the Embaſſadors for Florence; He ſhewed, that the title of his Commonweale was iuſt, for that they had bought Piſa in the yeare 1404. of Gabriel Maria Viſcount the lawfull Lord, by whom they were no ſooner put in poſſeſſion of their purchaſe, then the Piſans redeliuered themſelues by force: by which occaſion they were driuen to ſeeke to conquer it by a long warre, whoſe end was no leſſe proſperous then the occaſion was iuſt, and no leſſe praiſe-worthy the humanitie of the Florentines, then the victory glorious; for that hauing in their diſcretions to let periſh the people of Piſa, (languiſhing already with hunger) when they entred with their army into the Citie, they brought with them a greater quantitie of victuals then of weapons; and ſo in place to take away their liues by iuſt law of conqueſt and victory, they breathed new liues with their refreſhing and victuals, into bodies miſerable and not worthy of life: That the Citie of Piſa at no time had obtained any greatnes in the firme land, and much leſſe had bin able in power to win forrain & ſtrange peeces, ſeeing they could neuer make themſelues Lords ouer Lucques, a Citie communicating with them in neare neighborhood and borders: but they ſtood alwayes reſtrained and incloſed in a ſtraight territory, not ſeeking to make their fortune greater then was their vertue. And for their power at ſea, neither hath it bin ſo mightie as there is left any monument of it, nor of ſuch continuance as it hath any preſcription of time: for that, by the iuſt iudgement of God, whom they had prouoked by many acts of prophane impietie, and for a ſcourge of the long ciuill diſcords amongſt themſelues, it was long time before the purchaſe of the Florentines, fallen from all eſtate and greatneſſe, drained of all wealth and inhabitants, and at laſt reduced to ſuch a naked weakneſſe, that one Iaques d'Appian a ſimple notary of the country, was of power to make himſelfe Lord ouer them, leauing the Citie and territory as a ſucceſſion to his children: That the land & country of Piſa was of litle importance to the Florentines, except for the oportunitie of the ſituation, and conueniency of the ſea; ſeeing the reuenues that were drawne from thence were of litle conſideration, the exactions being ſo eaſie and light, that they exceed very litle the neceſſary expences, and yet the moſt part were leuied vpon merchant-ſtrangers, and by the meanes of the port of Liuorne. That touching the trade of merchandize, arts and offices, the Piſans were not bound with other lawes then did regulate all other cities ſubiect to the Florentines, who acknowledging to liue vnder a moderate and eaſie policie, had no deſire to change Lords, not hauing indeed that obſtinacie and pride of mind which is naturall in the Piſans, nor yet infected with a diſloyaltie ſo notorious, as it is made generall and famous by the ancient prouerbe of all Tuſcane. And albeit, ſince the Florentines had gouernment in Piſa, ſundry of the « ſeruation of his faith and iuſtice. The King hearing the differences thus diſcloſed by both the Embaſſadors, bare an inclination partiall to the Piſans, and wiſhed that during the warre of Naples, there might be a ſurceaſſing of armes betweene the two parties, or at leaſt that the Florentines would conſent that he might hold the whole country, aſſuring them that as ſoone as the conqueſt of Naples was accompliſhed, he would make perfect all his promiſes giuen at Florence.

This the Florentines refuſed, holding euen now for ſuſpected all the Kings words, and yet they forbare not with great conſtancie to preſſe him to keepe his promiſe: wherein, to make ſhew that he would ſatisfie them, (his intention indeed being to haue of them before the time the lxx. thouſand duckets which they had promiſed him) he diſpatched at the ſame inſtant he departed from Rome, the Cardinall of S. Malo as Embaſſador to Florence, making as though he ſent him thither to ſatisfie their demands; but in ſecret he charged him, that nouriſhing them with hopes till they had made paiment of the money, he ſhould leaue things in the ſame eſtate:
of which deceit, albeit the Florentines made ſufficient doubt, yet they aduanced forty thouſand duckets afore the tearme; which as ſoone as the Cardinall had receiued, he went to Piſa, pro-miſing to recontinue the poſſeſſion of the Eſtate to the Florentines: but he made a ſpeedy returne, without any effect of his promiſe, and leſſe anſwering the expectation of them of Florence, afore whom he excuſed himſelfe by the obſtinacie of the Piſans, and that being not able of himſelfe to diſpoſe them, his authoritie was leſſe ſufficient to conſtraine them, hauing no expreſſe commiſſion from the King. Laſtly it was not conuenient for him, being of holy profeſſi-on, to take or follow any counſell whereof might riſe effuſion of Chriſtian bloud: yet he beſtowed a new garriſon within the new Citadell, and had done the like in the old Caſtle if he could haue got the conſent of the Piſans, who grew dayly more and more in courage and forces by the ſecret helping of the Duke of Millan; who iudging it neceſſary that there ſhould be within Piſa a greater ſtrength, and a Leader of experience and valour, had ſent to them (couering himſelfe notwithſtanding, as he was wont, with the name of the Genoways) Luke Malvezze with new bands and companies: and letting paſſe no occaſion that might keepe the Florentines in buſineſſe, the better to hold them from offending the Piſans, he entertained into pay in common with the Siennoys, Iaques d'Appian Lord of Plombin, and John Sauelle, the rather to encourage the ſaid people of Sienna to defend Montpulcian, a place newly reuolted from the Florentines, and accepted by them of Sienna, without hauing regard to the confederation which they had together. At the ſame time alſo the Florentines were in no leſſe care and trauell for ſo-daine buſineſſe newly happened within the Citie: for immediatly after the King was departed from Florence, the better to reeſtabliſh their gouernment, they had in their Parliament (which in their cuſtome is a congregation aſſembled of all the Citizens in the place before the townehouſe, who deliberate with free voice vpon matters propounded by the great Magiſtrate) inſtituted a kind of policie, which vnder the name of a gouernment popular tended in many things

more to the power of a few then of euery one in generall. The which being grieuous to many, who fashioned in their minds a greater libertie, and hauing the priuate ambition of some one of the principall Citizens concurring, there was necessitie to dispute vpon a new forme of gouernment, wherein as it was communed vpon one day amongst the principall Magistrates and persons of greatest reputation, Paul Anthony Soderin, a Citizen wise and much respected, deliuered his opinion in this sort:

P. Anth Soderin reasoneth touching a forme of gouernment for Florence. Causes of popular gouernments.

Albeit those that haue written of ciuill matters, do lesse esteeme of the popular State, then of that wherein things are referred to one alone, or gouerned by the directions of graue men; yet, for that the desire of libertie is a desire ancient and almost naturall in this Citie, and the conditions and estate of our Citizens are equally proportioned, which is a necessary ground of popular gouernments: I might maintaine by easie and reasonable discourse, that it ought to be preferred before all other, were it not that the disputation would be superfluous, seeing in all our assemblies since the Parliament, it hath bin alwayes determined by a consent vniuersall, that the Citie should be gouerned in the name and with the authoritie of the people. But the diuersitie of opinions is risen vpon this, that certaine particulars, in things ordained in the Parliament, seeke to come neare and resemble that forme of Commonweale, vnder the which the Citie was gouerned before our libertie was oppressed by the family of the Medices and others, (of which number I confesse I am) supposing that the gouerment so established, bare in many things rather the name then the effects of a policie popular; and fearing the accidents which often happen by like gouernments, desire a forme more perfect, and more regarding the preseruation and protection of the concord and suretie of the Citizens: a thing which neither by reason, nor experience of times passed, can be hoped for in this Citie, but vnder a gouernment depending altogether vpon the power of the people, so that it be well and duly ordained and regulated, which thing consists principally in two foundations: The first is, that all ministrations and offices, as well in the Citie as through the whole demeane, be giuen (for a certaine time) by a Councell vniuersall, which according to our lawes may participate in the gouernment; without the approbation of which Councell, new lawes cannot be established: by this meane, not being in the power of priuate Citizens, nor of any particular faction or intelligence, to distribute dignities and authorities, no man shall be excluded by passion or partialitie of others, but offices shall be bestowed according to the vertues and merits of men: and vertue bearing this propertie to transferre dignities to those persons to whom her selfe is conioyned, it will be a meane and encouragement to euery one to striue by his vertues and good parts, with the aide publike and priuate, to open his way to honors and reputation; it shall be necessary that euery one abstaine from vices, and forbeare to hurt one another, and finally eschue both the study and action of all hatefull things in a Citie well instituted. And it cannot be in the power of one or a few, to introduce with new lawes, or with authoritie of a Magistrate, another gouernment, this being not to be changed, but by the will and priuitie of the Councell vniuersall. The second ground is, that the deliberations and counsels of importance, such as appertaine to peace and warre, to the construing and examination of new lawes, and generally to all things necessary for the administration of such a Citie or Empire, be managed by Magistrates particularly appointed to that charge, and by a Councell more priuate, compounded of wise and experienced Citizens, to be deputed and ordained by the Councell popular: for that the knowledge and iudgement of such affaires, falling not familiarly into the vnderstanding of euery one, it is necessary they be gouerned by such as are capable of them, and requiring oftentimes diligence and secrecie, they are not to be consulted or communicated with the multitude, as not being necessary for the preseruation of the publike libertie, that such things be handled in too great audience and company, seeing the libertie is assured as often as the distribution of magistracies, and deliberation of new lawes, depend on the vniuersall consent. These two foundations thus laid, you haue a true popular gouernment ordained, the libertie of the Citie grounded, and a perpetuall and commendable forme of Commonweale confirmed. There be many other things which tend to make this gouernment more perfect, but they are referred more conueniently to another time, to the end not to confound in this beginning the minds of men, which both suspicious by the memory of tyrannies past, and not accustomed to manage gouernments free, can not wholly know all things necessary to be ordained for preseruation of the libertie: and there be things, which for their litle importance and consideration, may without danger be deferred vn-

" vntill a time more apt,and better occaſion. No doubt,the citizens will embrace more and more
" this forme of Commonweale; and being by experience made dayly more capable of the truth,
" they cannot but deſire that their gouernment be poliſhed and brought to his full perfection:
" Neither can it but be ſuſtained and holden vp by theſe two foundations, which, how eaſie it is
" to lay and eſtabliſh,and what fruite they bring, is not to be proued onely by many reaſons, but
" alſo appeares plainly by examples. For, albeit the gouernment of the Venetians ſtands properly
" vpon gentlemen, yet thoſe gentlemen are no other then Citizens priuate,and ſo many in num" ber, and of ſo diuers conditions and qualities,as it cannot be denied, but that it doth much par" ticipate with a gouernment popular, and that in many things it cannot be imitated of vs: and
" yet it is principally founded vpon theſe two pillars and baſes, by the which hauing bin conti" nued by many ages,together with a libertie,vnitie,and concord ciuill, it is riſen to the glory and " greatneſſe which the world ſeeth. The vnitie and ſtrength of the Venetians hath not growne,as " many ſuppoſe, by their ſituation, for that in the ſame may be and haue bin many diſcords and
" ſeditions: but it hath proceeded for that they had a forme of policy ſo well ſorted and propor" tioned to it ſelfe,that neceſſarily it brought forth precious and wonderfull effects. Our owne ex" amples ought to moue vs no leſſe then ſtrangers, if we conſider on the contrary, that becauſe
" our Citie neuer had a forme of gouernment like vnto this, it was the cauſe that our eſtate and
" affaires haue bin ſo ſubiect to ordinary mutations, ſometimes troden vnder feet by the violence
" of tyrants; and ſometimes rent and diſmembred by the ambitious and couetous diſcords of cer-
" taine particulars;and ſometimes confounded by the vnbridled libertie of the communalty. And
" whereas cities were built for the reſt and happie life of the inhabitants, our felicities and our
" ioyes haue bin the confiſcation of our goods, the baniſhment, and execution of our miſerable
" Citizens. The gouernment brought into the Parlament, differeth not from the policies here" tofore ordained in this Citie,which being all infected with diſcords and calamities,after infinite
" trauels, both publike and priuate, they finally ingendred tyrannies: for which cauſe, and for no
" other, did the Duke of Athens oppreſſe the libertie in the times of our anceſtors; and in the " times ſucceeding, Coſmo de Medicis followed his example;whereof it is not to be maruelled: for,
" when the diſtribution of Magiſtracies,and deliberation of the lawes,haue not communitie with
" the common conſent, but depend vpon the arbitration of the leſſer number: then the Citizens
" not carefull of the publike benefite, but ſeeking their profites and ends priuate, riſe into ſects
" and conſpiracies particular, whereunto are ioyned the diuiſions of the whole Citie; a plague
" moſt certaine to all Commonweales and Empires: ſo that it cannot but be a better diſcretion
" to eſchue thoſe formes of gouernment, which by reaſons and examples in our ſelues we find to
" be hurtfull, and draw neare to thoſe policies which with the reaſons and examples of others,we " diſcerne to be wholſome and happie. And thus much I take boldneſſe to auouch (the truth of " the matter enforcing me) that the policie of our Citie running alwayes in that order, that a few
" Citizens ſhall haue an vnmeaſured authoritie, will proue to be a gouernment of a few tyrants,
" who will be ſo much more dangerous then one tyrant alone, by how much the ill is great, and
" hurts more,when it is much multiplied. And though there ſhould be none other miſchiefe at all,
" yet at leaſt wiſe, what for the diuerſitie of opinions, and for the ambition and different coue-
" touſneſſe of men, there could be no expectation of long concord: And diſcord, as it is hurtfull
" in all ſeaſons, ſo would it be moſt dangerous at this time, wherein you haue ſent into exile ſo
" mightie a Citizen,by whom you ſtand depriued of one of the principalleſt parts of your Eſtate,
" and when Italy hauing euen in her bowels forraine armies, ſtands on all ſides enuironed with " manifeſt perill. Very ſeldome,or poſſible neuer,it hath bin abſolutely in the power of all the Ci-
" tie to put order to it ſelfe according to our owne liking; the which power ſeeing God of his
" goodneſſe hath giuen you, loſe not the occaſion (to your owne detriment, and to the perpe-
" tuall blemiſh of the name of the Florentine wiſedome) to inſtitute a free gouernment, and ſo
" well digeſted,as that during your owne liues it may not onely procure you happineſſe, but alſo
" promiſe the ſame to your poſteritie,and ſo leaue as an inheritance to your children,ſuch a trea-
" ſure and felicitie,as your anceſtors neuer had nor knew.

Againſt this opinion reaſoneth Guid' Anth. Veſpucci.

To the contrary of this, did reaſon Guid' Anthony Veſpucci, a lawyer notable for his iudge-
" ment,and no leſſe ſingular for his facilitie and ſharpneſſe of wit: If the gouerment (ſaith he) in-
" ſtituted in the forme of Paul Anthony Soderin, would as eaſily bring forth the fruits that are deſi-
" red, as he hath liberally recounted them: ſure we ſhould ſhew great corruption in iudgement, if

if we would wish in our country any other sort of policie; and should seeme most dangerous Citizens, if we would not embrace a forme of Commonweale, wherein the vertues, merites, and valours of men, should be aboue all other things honored and recompenced. But I cannot see how it may be hoped, that a gouernment put wholly in the power of the people, can bring forth so many benefits: seeing no man doubts but it is a lesson in reason, a triall in experience, and an authoritie confirmed by great men, that in so great a multitude cannot be found that discretion, that experience, nor that order, which may promise that they will preferre the wise afore the ignorant, the good afore the ill, and the experienced afore such as neuer knew what it was to manage affaires. For, like as of a Iudge incapable and ignorant, can be no expectation of iust iudgement: so, in a people full of confusion and vanitie, is no hope (but at aduenture) of election or deliberation wise or reasonable: and that which in publike gouernments, wisemen and such as follow the study of no other affaires, can hardly discerne, let vs neuer beleeue that a multitude vnexperienced, ignorant, compounded of so great diuersitie of spirits, conditions and customes, and wholly giuen to things that concerne them particularly, can distinguish and know. Besides, the immoderate perswasion that euery one will haue of himselfe, will kindle in euery one a couetousnesse of honors, not sufficing to men in popular gouernment to enioy the honest fruits of libertie, but they will aspire all to the degrees principall, and seeke to haue place in the counsels of things of most importance and hardnesse, for that lesse in vs then in any other Citie, reigneth the modestie to giue place to such as know most, and deserue best. And so nourishing our selues with perswasion, that of right we ought to be all equall in all things, (the power resting in the multitude) places of vertue, valour, and merite will be confounded; and this couetousnesse stretched out into the greatest part, will bring to passe, that such may do most as know least and merite lesse; for that being most in number, they will haue most power, opinions being rather counted then considered. These things well weighed, what assurance can there be, that contenting themselues with the forme which now you would bring in, they would not immediatly fall to disorder, and confound with inuentions new and lawes vndiscreet, which wise men could not resist, the wayes to gouerne a Commonweale, which had bin wisely deliberated and established? Which things being dangerous at all times in such a sort of Commonweale, would bring farre more perill at this present; seeing it is the nature of men, when they come out of one extremitie, wherein they haue bin holden by force, to runne with a swift course to another extremitie, without staying in the midst: euen so, men drawne out of a tyranny, if they be not restrained, runne headlong into an vnbridled libertie, which iustly may be called a tyranny: because in these actions a people and mukitude is like vnto a tyrant, when he giueth where is no cause of merite, and taketh from him that hath well deserued, confounding the degrees and distinctions of persons; yea haply their tyranny is so much the more hurtfull, by how much their ignorance (containing neither weight, measure nor law) is greater then the malignity, although it be gouerned by some rule, with some bridle, or some limites. And we ought not to be moued by the example of the Venetians, for that in their behalfe both the situation makes something, and the forme of gouernment receiued of long time may do much, together with the order and disposition of things ruled in such sort, that the counsels of importance rest more in the power of a few then of many, and their spirits haply not being by nature so subtile as ours, they are more easie to be kept quiet and contented. Besides, the policie of the Venetians stands not only vpon the two foundations that haue bin considered, but for their perfection and firmnesse it imports much that they haue a Duke perpetuall, with many other ordinances, which whosoeuer would introduce into this Commonweale, should seeme to bring in innouations, and find many resistances, seeing our Citie takes not now her being, nor at this present the first time of her institution. And therefore ancient customes impugning oftentimes common profit, and men suspecting that vnder colour of preseruation of the libertie, there would be raised a new tyranny, wholsome counsels will be of litle force; euen as in a body infected and repleniished with ill humors, medicines are not of that seruice, as in a body purged. For which reasons, and for the nature of humane things which commonly go impairing, it is more to be feared, that that which in this beginning shall be imperfectly ordained, will be wholly disordered with time, then to hope that by time and with occasions it may be reduced to perfection: we haue examples of our owne, and need not fetch them from others. For, tell me, at what time hath the people gouerned absolutely this City, that it hath not bin full of discords, that it hath not suffered dismembring,

" bring, and laſtly that the State hath not immediatly changed? And if we ſtand ſo much vpon
" the examples of others, why do we not remember, that the gouernment wholly popular, bred
" to Rome ſo many tumults, that had it not bin for the ſcience and diſcipline of warre, the life of " that Commonweale had bin ſhort? Let vs remember, that Athens a moſt flouriſhing and mighty
" Citie, loſt not for other occaſion her Empire, and ſo fell into ſeruitude of her owne citizens and
" ſtrangers, then for that they did diſpoſe of great affaires with the deliberations & counſels of the " communaltie. But I ſee not for what occaſion it may be ſaid, that in the forme introduced in the " Parlament, the liberte is not there wholly found, ſeeing all things are referred to the diſpoſition
" of Magiſtrates, and they not perpetuall, but changing, are not elected of a few, but approued of
" many, and ought according to the ancient cuſtome of the Citie, to be referred to the arbitre-
" ment of the lot: then they cannot be diſtributed by factions, or by the appetite of Citizens par" ticular. We ſhall haue a farre greater aſſurance when the affaires of moſt importance ſhall paſſe
" by the examination and direction of the moſt wiſe, the moſt practiſed, and moſt graue men,
" who will manage and gouerne them with another order, another ſecretie, and another iudge-
" ment, then would be expreſſed in a multitude or communaltie vncapable of ſuch things, who " ſometimes when is leaſt need are moſt prodigall in expences, and exſtoones in weightie buſines-
" ſes ſo ſparing and niggardly, that oftentimes for ſauing a litle, they fall into very great expen-
" ces and dangers. Indeed as Paul Anthonie hath ſaid, the infirmitie of Italy, and particularly of our " countrey, is very great, and of no litle conſideration. Then what folly is greater, then when we
" haue need of Phyſitions experienced and wiſe, to put our bodies into the hands of ſuch as haue
" leaſt skill and experience? And laſtly, you haue to conſider, that you ſhall maintaine your
" people in greater reſt, and leade them moſt eaſily to counſels wholeſome both for themſelues,
" and to the benefite of euery one, in giuing them in the Commonweale a moderate part and au-" thoritie; ſeeing if you referre all things to their arbitration, there will be danger that they will be-
" come inſolent, and wholly diſagreeing from the counſels of your wiſe, carefull, and affectioned
" Citizens."

Ieronimo Sauonarola eſteemed for a Prophet in Florence.

In this Councell, whereunto was not admitted the great number of Citizens, the aduice then tending to a forme of gouernment not ſo large and popular, had preuailed, if amongſt the deliberations of men, there had not bene mixed authoritie diuine, pronounced by the mouth of Ieronimo Sauonarola a religious man of the order of Frier Preachers. This man hauing bin continually exerciſed for many yeares in the publike preaching of Gods word at Florence, and hauing ioyned to his ſingular doctrine a generall brute of holineſſe of life, had gotten in the opinion of moſt part of the people, the name and authoritie of a Prophet: for that at times wherein in Italy was no other apparence in mans reaſon, then of common tranquillitie, he would in his Sermons propheſie of the coming of forreine armies, with ſo great aſtoniſhment of men, that neither wals nor campes were able to reſiſt them: which things, with many others of other nature, he would aſſure that he did not foretell by diſcourſe humane, or knowledge of the Scriptures, but ſimply did foreſee them by reuelation diuine; and ſo would ſometimes touch the mutation of the ſtate of Florence. But at that time he deteſted publikly the forme of gouernment agreed vpon in the Parlament, affirming that it was the will of God, that they did erect a policie meerly popular, in ſuch ſort that it ſhould not be in the power of a few citizens to alter neither the ſurtie nor the libertie of the reſidue: inſomuch that for the reuerence of one of ſo great a name, ioyned to the deſire of many, ſuch as were of the other opinion, ſhould not be able to reſiſt ſo great an inclination. Therefore this matter being many times propounded and debated, it was laſtly determined, that there ſhould be held a Councell of all the Citizens, wherein ſhould haue no acceſſe (ſo it was ſpread in many places in Italy) the dregs of the people, but onely ſuch as by the ancient lawes of the Citie might participate in the gouernment: In this Councell they ſhould not meddle with, nor diſpoſe of other things, then of the election of all the Magiſtrates for the Citie and for the demeane, and of the confirmation of proviſions of money, together with all the lawes ordained before by the Magiſtrates, and other Councels more priuate and ſtrait. And to the end that the occaſions of ciuill diſcords ſhould be taken away, and the ſpirits of euery one the more aſſured, it was prohibited by decree publike, according to the example of the Athenians, not to remember the errors and tranſgreſſions committed in times paſt in the affaires of Eſtate. Vpon which foundations, might perhaps haue bene conſtituted a well ordered and ſtable gouernment, if at the ſame time they had introduced all the ordinances which then came into the conſideration of wiſe men: but ſuch things being not able to be deliberated without the conſent of many, who for the memory of things paſt were full of ſuſpitions, it was iudged and determined, that for the preſent the grand Councell ſhould be eſtabliſhed, as a ground and foundation of the new libertie, referring to accompliſh that which wanted, vntill a better opportunitie of time, and vntill (by the meanes of experience) the publike vtilitie ſhould be knowne of ſuch, as had no capacitie to know it by reaſon and iudgement. This was the courſe and condition of the affaires of Tuskane.

But in this meane while, the French King, after he had conquered the Citie of Naples, to giue a full perfection to his victory, he had principally to looke to remoue two impediments: The one, how he might get new Caſtle, and the Caſtle of the Egge, which are two fortreſſes of Naples, holding good yet for Ferdinand; but for the towne of S. Vincent, built for the guard of the hauen, he had it without much reſiſtance: His other conſideration was, how he might reduce the whole kingdome to his obedience. In which two things fortune ſtill followed him with a full ſaile. For, new Caſtle the habitation of the Kings, ſeated vpon the banke or ſhoare of the ſea, by the couetouſneſſe and cowardize of fiue hundred Lance-knights holding garriſon there, after a ſlight defence was rendred, with condition that they might depart in ſafetie with all the goods they were able to carry. In this Caſtle was found great quantities of victuals, whereof the King without conſideration to that might happen, made prodigall liberalities to certaine of his owne people. And touching the Caſtle called the Egge, built within the ſea vpon a rocke, aforetime parcell of the firme land, but now deuided from it by the operation of Lucullus, was ioyned with a narrow bridge to the next brinkes or ſhoares of Naples: they within the rocke, ſeeing themſelues battered without ceaſſing with the artillery, which might well ſhake the wals, but nothing moue the rocke, agreed to yeeld vp the place, if within eight dayes they were not ſuccoured. The Barons alſo and gouernours of the communaltie, went many dayes iourneys to meet the French Captaines and companies of ſouldiers ſent into ſundry parts of the Realme, ſtriuing who ſhould be the firſt to receiue them, with ſuch inclination or aſtoniſhment of all, that almoſt all the places of ſtrength were rendred by thoſe that kept them, without any reſiſtance at all: yea the rocke of Caietta notwithſtanding it was made ſtrong with men, and all things neceſſary for defence, yet after a few light aſſaults, it yeelded to the diſcretion of the victors: ſo that within a few dayes, and with a wonderfull facilitie, all the kingdome was brought into the obedience of King Charles, except the Iſle of Iſchia, the Caſtles of Brunduſia and Gallipoli in Powilla, and in Calabria the rocke of Reggi, ſituate in the point of Italy right ouer againſt Sicile, the Citie holding for the King: and except alſo Turpia and Mantia, who in the beginning diſplayed the banners of France, but refuſing to liue vnder the ſubiection of other then the King himſelfe, who had already diſpoſed them to certaine of his fauourites, they changed counſell, and returned to their firſt Lord. The like was done within a little time after by the Citie of Brunduſia, to the which the French King hauing ſent no men, but vſing negligence where was neceſſitie of care and counſell, did ſcarcely heare their Magiſtrates ſent to him to Naples to capitulate: by which occaſion ioyning with the opportunitie offered, thoſe that kept the Caſtles in the name of Ferdinand, had good meanes by perſwaſions to draw againe the Citie to the deuotion of the Aragons: by which example alſo, the Citie of Otrante lately declared for the French, and no creature ſent thither to receiue them, continued not long in their affection: All the Lords and Barons of the Realme (except Alphonſo d'Aualo Marquis of Peſcaire, who left within new Caſtle by Ferdinand, was gone to him when he perceiued the inclination of the Lance-knights to yeeld: and except two others, who (for that the French King had giuen away their eſtates, were fled into Sicile) came to do homage to the new King: who, deſiring to aſſure wholy ſo great a conqueſt by way of concord, called afore him vnder ſafe-conduct afore he had wonne the rocke of the Egge, Dom Federicke, who, as well for that he had remained many yeares in the Court of France in the time of the Kings father, as alſo for that he touched his Maieſtie in kindred, was much fauoured of all the Lords of France. The King told him, he would endue Ferdinand (ſo that he would leaue all that was his in the Realme of Naples) with eſtates and large reuenues in France: and touching him, to recompence him liberally with all that he poſſeſſed there. But Federicke knowing that his nephew was determined to accept no condition, except he might haue Calabria, anſwered with words graue and wiſe: That ſeeing God, fortune, and the good wils of men, had concurred in his preſent felicities, to giue him the king-

dome of Naples, Ferdinand was not determined to make resistance against so fatall a dispositi-on, but, rather esteeming it no shame to giue place to so great a King, he would no lesse then others, remaine in his obedience and deuotion, so that his Maiestie would contribute to him some part of the kingdome, (secretly meaning Calabria) to the end that dwelling therein not as a King, but in the condition of one of his Barons, he might honour the clemency and magnanimitie of the French King, in whose seruice he hoped to haue once occasion to shew that vertue which his malicious fortune would not suffer him to expresse in the action of his owne safetie: That, nothing could turne more to the glory of King Charles then that counsell, bearing resemblance and affinitie with the counsels of those Kings whom antiquitie hath so much recommended vnto vs, who by such meanes raised their names to immortalitie, and obtained amongst the people diuine honours: That, it was a counsell no lesse for his suretie then for his glory; for that Ferdinand brought to his deuotion, the Realme would be assured to him, that he should not hereafter feare the change of fortune, who had this common propertie: that as often as victories were not assured with moderation and discretion, she would blemish by some accident vnlooked for, the reputation of the glory gotten. But the King doubting that if he communicated any part of the kingdome with his competitor, he should expose the residue to manifest perill, Dom Federicke parted from him without any thing doing: and Ferdinand vnderstanding of the rendring of the Castles, sailed into Sicile with fourteene light galleys slenderly appointed, wherein he passed from Naples: This he did to be ready vpon all occasions, leauing the guard of the rocke of Ischia to Ianicke d'Aualo brother to Alphonso, both men of great valour, and of singular faith towards their Lord. But the French King, to take from the enemy that receptacle, very conuenient to trouble the Realme, sent thither his army by sea, which arriued at length in the port of Naples; and finding the towne abandoned, they forbare to assaile the rocke, wherein, for his inuincible strength by situation, they discerned many impossibilities to preuaile: and therefore the King determined to send other ships from Prouence and from Genes, to take Ischia, and assure the sea which Ferdinand vexed sometimes. But their counsell and diligence were not equall to their fortune, seeing that all things went slowly forward, and were guided with most great negligence and confusion. For, the French by reason of so great felicitie, became more insolent then of custome, and let go at aduenture the affaires of importance, hauing no other thoughts then of feasting and pleasures: and such as were great about the King, cared not but for their owne particular, and to draw of the victory all the profite they could, without any respect either to the dignitie or profite of their Prince.

The death of Gemin Otto. a Turke, kept in refuge by the Pope.

About this time died at Naples Gemin Ottoman, to the great displeasure of the King, who layd vp in him many foundations and opportunities for the warre he determined to make against the Turke: and it was beleeued his death was brued in a cup of poyson, which the Pope had giuen him, to worke his end in a certaine time: or that hauing deliuered him against his will, and so depriued of the forty thousand duckats which his brother Baiazet payed him yearely, he tooke for consolation, that he that had taken him away, should receiue by him no commodity or profite: or at least for enuie he bare to the glory of the French King: or lastly for feare that things succeeding happily with him against the Infidels, he would afterwards turne his thoughts to reforme the abuses of the Church, which being wholly altered from the ancient customes, made euery day of lesse authority the Christian Religion; euery one withall hauing an assured expectation that they would further decline before the end of his reigne; which being gotten by wicked meanes, was haply neuer in the memory of man administred with worse orders: And there were that beleeued (for the corrupt nature of the Pope made credible in him all wickednesse) that Baiazet after he vnderstood that the French King prepared to passe into Italy, practised by the meanes of George Bucciardin corrupted with money, to oppresse the life of Gemin. And yet the King nourishing still his inclination to the warres of the Turkes, (more vpon a greene humour of youth and volubility of mind, then by maturitie of counsell) ceassed not for his death to send into Greece the Archbishop of Durac, of the nation of Albania, who put the King in hopes, by the meanes of certaine factions of the banished, and other vaine intelligences, to stirre vp some commotion in that prouince: but new accidents constrained him to turne his spirits to new thoughts.

It hath bene shewed before, how the desire to vsurpe the Duchie of Millan, ioyned to a feare that Lodowike Sforce had of the Aragons and Peter de Medicis, induced him to procure the

the French King to passe into Italy; by whose comming, after he had obtained his ambitious pretence, and that the Aragons were brought into those necessities, that there was no abilitie remaining to defend their proper safetie: a second feare, both more great and more reasonable then the first, began to present it selfe before his eyes; and that was the seruitude houering ouer him and all the Italians, if the kingdome of Naples were ioyned to the power of the Crowne of France: and for that cause he desired that by the Florentines should be obiected many difficulties and impediments against the resolution of his enterprise. But when he saw his Maiestie was easily ioyned with that Commonweale, and with the same facilitie had ouercome all the impediments of the Pope, and lastly without resistance had preuailed ouer the Realme of Naples, the danger seemed euery day so much the greater to him, by how much the course of the French victories aduanced more and more with facilitie, fortune and felicitie. A like feare also began to stirre in the minds of the Senate of Venice, who in all their counsels hitherunto had constantly persеuered in neutrality, gouerning their abstinence with so great discretion, no lesse in action then in demonstration, that there was no meanes to suspect their inclination more to one partie then to another. So that hauing chosen for Ambassadours to the King, Anthonie Loredan and Dominicke Treuisan, (yet not vntill they vnderstood that the King had passed the mounts) they lingred so long to send them, that the King was arriued at Florence afore them. But now the Senate perceiuing the violent course of so great felicitie, and that the King like a thunderbolt, without any resistance ran through all Italy, they began to esteeme as their owne the damage of their neighbours, and to feare lest in the ruine of others their destruction were also conspired; chiefly for that the King hauing made himselfe Lord of Pisa and other fortresses of the Florentines, and hauing left garrison in Sienna, and after done the like in the state of the Church, it seemed to them a signe and argument that his thoughts stretched further then the Realme of Naples. For these causes the Senate gaue willing eare to the perswasions of Lodowike Sforce, who as soone as the Florentines had yeelded to the King, had begun to solicite them to ioyne with him in a common remedy against common dangers: and it was beleeued, that if the French King had met with any impediments either at Rome, or at his entry into the Realme of Naples, they had al together take armes against him: but the Kings victory was so sodaine, that it preuented all the impediments that could be obiected. And now the king doubting the practises of Lodowike, had retained in his pay since the conquest of Naples, Iohn Iaques Trimulce with an hundred lances, & with an honorable pension, ioyning vnto him with many promises the Cardinall Fregosa and Obietto de Fiesque: these, for that they were mighty instruments to trouble and raise emotions in the towne of Genes; the other, for that being a chiefe leader of the Guelfes faction at Millan, he caried a minde much deuided from Lodowike; to whom as yet the King refused to giue the principalitie of Tarenta, saying that he was not bound to do it vntill he had reduced into his power all the Realme of Naples. Which things being very displeasing to Lodowike, he stayed twelue galleys which were armed for the King at Genes, and forbad the appointing of any more vessels there for the French seruice; which the King complained of, as the cause why he did not eftsoones reassaile with a new supply the rocke of Tschia.

Lodo. Sforce beginneth too late to feare the greatnesse of the French.

Then suspitions and disdaines growing on all parts, and the sodaine conquest of Naples representing to the Venetians and the Duke of Millan the present perill of their estates: they were constrained to deferre no longer to put their thoughts in execution. And that which furthered their resolution and courage, was the consideration of the mightie company of Confederates: for that to this the Pope was no lesse ready, to whom the greatnesse of the French was fearfull, then Maximilian the Emperour, to whom for many occasions of hatred to the Crowne of France, and for the many iniuries receiued by the King reigning, the prosperities of France, were alwayes, aboue all other, most displeasing. But the chiefe grounds and foundations whereupon the Venetians and Lodowike wrought, were the King and Queene of Spaine, who being a little before bound to the French King (not for other respect then to draw from him the Earledome of Rossillion) not to hinder him in the conquest of Naples, had cunningly reserued to themselues till that time a free power to do the contrary. For, (if their writers be true) there was a clause annexed to the capitulations made for restitution of the Earledome of Rossillion, which bare, that they should not be bound to any thing that touched the preiudice of the Church: of which exception they inferred, that if the Pope, for the interest of his chiefe, desired them to succour the Realme of Naples, they had good right so to do, without breaking their faith, or contradicting their promiſes. And to this they added afterwards, That by the ſame capitulations they were forbidden to oppoſe themſelues againſt King Charles, in caſe it appeared that the ſame kingdome did iudicially appertaine vnto him. But what difference ſoeuer was betweene the truth and their conſtruction of things, it is certaine, that hauing got that they deſired, they began not onely to giue hope to the ſuccours of them of Aragon, and ſecretly to ſolicite the Pope not to abandon their cauſe; but alſo, as they had in the beginning exhorted the French King with words moderate, as louers of his glory and zealous to Religion, to conuert his armies rather againſt Infidels then the Chriſtian nations: ſo they continued eſtſoones that courſe, but with ſo much more efficacie, and with words ſo much the more ſuſpitious, by how much the victory of the King aduanced: and to the end they might haue the better meanes to nouriſh in greater hopes the Pope and the Aragons, giuing out neuertheleſſe that they had regard onely to the guard of Sicilie, they were ready to ſend thither an army by ſea, which arriued there after the loſſe of Naples, but yet with equipage and furniture more in demonſtrations then in effects, for that it contained not aboue eight hundred horſemen mounted vpon Iennets, and a thouſand footmen Spaniards. They vſed theſe apparences vntill the taking of Oſtia by the Colonnoys, and the threats of the French againſt the Pope, gaue them a more honeſt occaſion to aduance that which they had reſolued in their minds: And following their deuice to action, they proteſted openly to the King whileſt he was at Florence, by their Ambaſſadours, that according to the office of Chriſtian Princes, they would take the defence and protection of the Pope, and the Realme of Naples (a chiefe of the Church of Rome:) and hauing already begun (as ſoone as they vnderſtood of the flying of the Aragons) to negotiate with the Venetians and the Duke of Millan for confederation, they eſtſoones ſolicited them with a new inſtance, to communicate with them for their common ſuretie againſt the French men.

A confederate league againſt the French king.

So that at length, in the moneth of Aprill and in the Citie of Venice, where were the Ambaſſadors of all thoſe Princes, was contracted a confederation betweene the Pope, the Emperour, the King of Spaine, the Venetians, and the Duke of Millan; the title and publication whereof was onely for the defence of the eſtates of one another, reſeruing place to whoſoeuer would enter it with conditions reaſonable. But they all being of opinion that it was neceſſary ſo to tẽper things as the French King might not hold Naples, it was agreed in capitulations more ſecret, that the bands of Spaniards arriued in Sicilie, ſhould be a ſuccour for the recouering of that kingdome to Ferdinand of Aragon, who with a great hope of the good wils of the people, laboured to enter into Calabria: That the Venetians at the ſame time with their army by ſea ſhould aſſaile the ſea coaſts of the ſaid kingdome: That the Duke of Millan (to hinder ſuccours that might come out of France) ſhould do what he could to get the Citie of Aſt, wherein was the Duke of Orleans with a very ſmall ſtrength: That to the Emperour and King of Spaine ſhould be contributed by the other Confederates a certaine quantitie of money, to the end that either of them ſhould make warre vpon the Realme of France with a puiſſant army. The Confederates alſo deſiring that all Italie would be vnited in the ſame concord of will, made inſtance to the Florentines and Duke of Ferrara to participate with this league. But the Duke being dealt withall after the league was publiſhed, refuſed to take armes againſt the French King; and yet, with an Italian ſubtiltie he conſented that Dom Alphonſo his eldeſt ſonne ſhould take pay of the Duke of Millan for an hundred and fifty men at armes, with the title of Lieutenant ouer all his companies. But the cauſe of the Florentines was otherwiſe, hauing no leſſe iuſt occaſion to leaue the French King, then allured to the confederation with many great offers: for that immediatly after the publicatiõ of the league, Ludowike offered them in the name of all the Confederates (ſo that they would communicate in the league) all their forces to reſiſt the King, if, in his returne from Naples, he would offend them, and to ioyne with them as ſoone as might be for the recouering of Piſa and Liuorne. And on the other ſide, the King making no reckoning of the promiſes he had made at Florence, had not in the beginning reſtored them to the poſſeſſion of their townes, nor ſince the conqueſt of Naples redeliuered the Caſtles of the ſame: making his faith and oath inferiour to the counſels of thoſe, who fauouring the cauſe of the Piſans, perſwaded him that the Florentines, as ſoone as they were reſtored, would vnite with the other Italians: and notwithſtanding the great ſummes of money which they had beſtowed vpon the Cardinall S. Malo, yet he reſiſted coldly ſuch as incenſed the King againſt them, as one that would not for the loue of the Florentines come to contention with the great ones of the kings Court. Further not only in theſe but alſo in many other things the king had made manifeſt, that he made no reckoning of his faith, neither did he conſider how important the amitie of the Florentines might be to him in thoſe times; inſomuch that one day their Ambaſſadours complaining of the rebellion of Montpulcian, and ſummoning him, according to his bond, to compell them of Sienna to render it: he anſwered as in ſcorne; What haue I to do if your ſubiects rebell, becauſe they are ill intreated? Yet notwithſtanding, the Florentines not ſuffering diſdaine to carrie them againſt their proper profite, determined not to hearken to the requeſts of the Confederates: aſwell not to prouoke againſt them of new the armie of France in the kings returne, as for that they might the ſooner hope to haue reſtitution of their places by ſuch as kept them: and laſtly, for that they truſted but litle in thoſe promiſes, knowing that they were hated of the Venetians, for the impediments which at ſundry times they had giuen to their enterpriſes; and knowing manifeſtly that Lodowike aſpired to the Lordſhip of Piſa.

But ſo it is, that about theſe times the reputation of the French began to diminiſh in the kingdome of Naples, for that giuing themſelues to their pleaſures, and gouerning all things at aduenture, they looked not to chaſe the Aragons out of thoſe few places yet holden by them, which they might eaſily haue done, if they had followed their fortune. But much more began they to decline in opinion, affection, and friendſhip: for, albeit the king ſhewed himſelfe very fauourable and liberall towards the people, in granting throughout the Realme ſo many priuiledges and exemptions, as they amounted to more then two hundred thouſand duckats by yeare, yet other things were not directed nor gouerned with ſuch order and diſcretion as appertained: for that the king would not take the paines to heare the complaints and ſuites of men, but referred ouer the whole charge of the affaires to ſuch as gouerned himſelfe; who partly by incapacitie, and partly by couetouſneſſe, confounded all things: ſo that the Nobility were not embraced with that humanitie they looked for, and much leſſe had recompences equall to their merits; but found many difficulties to enter into the chambers and audience of the king; there was made no diſtinction of perſons: the merits and ſeruices of men were not conſidered but at aduenture: the minds of ſuch as naturally were eſtranged from the houſe of Aragon were not confirmed: many delayes and difficulties were ſuborned touching the reſtitution of the ſtates and goods of thoſe that were of the faction of Anioy, and of the other Barons that had bene baniſhed by the old Ferdinand: fauours and graces were imparted to ſuch as procured them by corruption and meanes extraordinary; from many they tooke without iuſtice or reaſon, and to many gaue without occaſion or deſeruing: Almoſt all offices and dignities were transferred to the French, in whom were alſo inueſted (to the great griefe of the natural Lords) all the townes of the demaine (ſuch they call thoſe that are wont to obey immediatly the king:) things ſo much the more grieuous, by how much they had bene vſed to the wiſe and well ordered gouernments of the kings of the houſe of Aragon, and for that the king had promiſed there ſhould be no alteration of thoſe gouernments. But that which added much to this diſcontentment, was the naturall arrogancie of the French, aggrauated much by the facilitie of the victorie, which carried them into ſuch opinions of themſelues, that they eſteemed nothing of the whole Monarchie of Italie. Much more alſo was added by their inſolence and violence in taking vp their lodgings, no leſſe at Naples then in other parts of the Realme, where their companies were diſtributed, who did euery where ill intreate their hoſts: inſomuch that the ardent deſire which before they had of them, was now turned into extreme hate: and on the contrary in place of the malice they bare to the Aragons, there was inſinuation of compaſſion to Ferdinand, no leſſe for the generall expectation of his vertue, then for the memory of the gracious ſpeech which with ſo great ſweetneſſe and conſtancie he deliuered to the Neapolitans the day of his departure: the fame ſo working that that Citie and almoſt all the kingdome expected with no leſſe deſire, an occaſion to call backe the Aragons, then a few moneths before, they had deſired their deſtruction. Now began to be agreeable to them the name ſo hatefull of Alphonſo, calling iuſt ſeueritie, that which they had wont to note in him for crueltie; and interpreting to true ſinceritie of minde, that which wrongfully they had wont to conſter pride and fierceneſſe: ſuch is the nature of the people, inclined to hope more then they ought, and endure leſſe then is neceſſary, alwaies thirſting after innouations, and neuer contented with the time preſent: but chiefly of the inhabitants of Naples: who, of all the regions in Italie are moſt noted of inconſtancie, and deſire of new things.

Before this new league was made, the French king had determined to returne into France with ſpeed, moued more with a light fancie, and a vehement deſire of his Court, then with conſiderations diſcreet or well tempered: ſeeing that in the kingdome of Naples remained vndecided many and great affaires of Princes and eſtates, and the parts of the Realme being not fully conquered, his victory had not yet her iuſt perfection. But after he knew that ſo many Princes were drawne into league againſt him, he was much moued in his minde, and fell to deuiſe with his Lords what he were beſt to do in ſo great an accident; ſpecially euery one aſſuring him that of a long time before the Chriſtian Princes had not made ſo puiſſant a league. And thoſe of his Counceil were of aduice, that he ſhould diſpatch his departure, doubting that by how long he taried, by ſo much the more would the difficulties increaſe, ſeeing the Confederats would winne time to make greater prouiſions; and the bruite ranne already, that by their direction a great leuie of Almaines ſhould paſſe into Italie, and men began to ſpeake much of the perſon of the Emperour: They perſwaded that the king would prouide that there might paſſe with diligence out of France, new bands of ſouldiers to the towne of Aſt, both to guard that Citie, and to keepe the Duke of Millan in neceſſitie to defend his owne countrey; and withall to be in readineſſe to paſſe further according to the occaſions of his Maieſties ſeruices. It was alſo determined in the ſame councell, to labour with all diligence, and with very great offers, to ſeparate the Pope from the other Confederates, and to diſpoſe him to transferre to the kings perſon the inueſtiture of the Realme of Naples, which (notwithſtanding he had promiſed abſolutely at Rome,) yet he had denied it till that day, and with declaratiō that that grant or conceſſion ſhould not beare preiudice to the title and rights of another. In a deliberation ſo graue, and amongſt ſo many thoughts of ſuch importance, was not loſt the memory of the affaires of Piſa. For, the king deſiring for many regards, that in him might remaine power to diſpoſe of that eſtate, and doubting leſt by the ayde of the Confederates the people of Piſa would bereaue him of the Citadell, he ſent thither by ſea together with the Ambaſſadours of the towne which were with him, ſixe hundred French footmen, who being arriued there, conceiued the ſame affection which others that had bene left there, had apprehended: and being puſhed forward with a deſire to ſpoyle and prey, after they had receiued money of the Piſans, they went with their companies to encampe afore the towne of Librafatta, where the Piſans (whoſe Captaine was Luke Maluezzze) had bene in campe certaine daies afore, vpon an aduertiſement that the Florentines had ſent part of their bands to Montpulcian, and hearing of the approch of their enemies, were raiſed and gone the day before: but returning thither eſtſoones with the ſupply of the French men, they tooke it in few daies; for the Florentine armie ſent to ſuccour it, could not paſſe the riuer of Sercle for the violence of waters, neither durſt they take the other way by the walls of Lucques, for the ill diſpoſition of that people, who were much moued, and fauoured greatly the liberty of the Piſans. Theſe bands with thoſe of the French that remained of the conqueſt of Librafatta, ran ouer the whole countrey of Piſa, as enemies manifeſt to the Florentines: who, when they complained, the king gaue no other anſwer, then aſſoone as he ſhould come into Tuskanē, he would redeliuer all thoſe places he had promiſed, deſiring them to beare with patience that little reſpite. But the meanes of departure were not ſo eaſie to the king, as his deſire was ready: for that his armie was not ſo great, as, being deuided into two parts, it was able to bring him into Aſt without danger, and to ſuffice both to auoyd the impediments of the Cō-federates, and defend the kingdome of Naples againſt ſo many agitations as were then in preparing.

The French king taketh counſell of his Lords what to do againſt the league of Confederates.

In theſe difficulties he was conſtrained (to the end the Realme ſhould not be naked of defence) to diminiſh the prouiſions reſerued for his owne ſafety; and yet to keepe his perſon from manifeſt perill, his neceſſities enforced him not to leaue in the kingdome ſo ſtrong an army as was needfull. Therefore he determined to leaue there halfe of his Swiſſers, and a part of the French footmen, eight hundred lancemen of France, and about fiue hundred men at armes of the Italians which were in his pay, deuided partly vnder the enſignes of the Prefect of Rome, & partly vnder the Colonnois and Anthonie Sauelle, Captaines who had taſted plentifully of his liberalities, in the diſtribution of the townes and eſtates of the kingdome, but ſpecially the Colonnois: for that to Fabricius he had giuen the countrey of Alba and Taillecoſſa poſſeſſed before by Virginio Vrſin: and Proſpero he had indued with the Duchie of Tracetta and the Citie of Fondi, with with many hamlets which belonged to the familie of Caetane and Montfortin, together with many other peeces adioyning, taken from the house of the Comtes. To these forces, he made reckoning that in all necessities he should vnite the forces of those Barons, who for their owne suretie, were constrained to desire his greatnesse: but specially the powers of the Prince of Salerne, whom he had restored to the office of Admirall, and of the Prince of Bisignian. He created as Lieutenant generall ouer all the Realme, Gilbert de Bourbon Duke of Montpensier, a Captaine more esteemed for the greatnesse of his house, and that he did participate in the bloud royall, then for his proper vertue: he assigned other Captaines in many parts of the Realme, on whom he had bestowed estates and reuenues; of these the chiefe was Monsieur d'Aubigny, whom he had made great Constable of the Realme for Calabria: In Caietta, the Seneshall of Beaucaire, whom he had raised to the office of high Chamberlaine: And in Abruzze, Gratian a valiant Captaine of great reputation: promising them to send them speedy rescue of money & men. But in the meane while to entertaine the warre, he left them no other prouision, then the assignation of those moneys which should be daily gathered of the reuenues of the Realme, which began already to wauer and shake, for that the name of the Aragons began to reuiue in many places: For, at the same time that the king would depart from Naples, Ferdinand accompanied with the Spanish armie that came by sea into the Isle of Sicile, was descended into Calabria, to whom flocked with a swift readinesse many troupes of the countrymen, the City of Regge rendring it selfe to him, whose Castell had bene alwaies kept in his name. At the same time was discouered about the shoares of Pouilla the Venetian army by sea, ouer whom was Captaine Anthonie Grimany, a man in that commonweale of great authoritie: But neither for these, nor any other signes of changes towards, the king did not forbeare, nor once suspend or linger his deliberation to go his way. For, besides that haply they were driuen by necessitie, the desire was incredible in the king and all his Court to returne into France, as though fortune that was sufficient to make them get so great a victorie, had bene still able so to preserue it for them. In this time also held good to Ferdinand, the Isles of Ischia and of Lipara, which albeit they were nearer to Sicile, yet are they members of the kingdome of Naples: he held Regge which he had newly recouered, and euen in Calabria, he commanded Villeneufue with the Castell, and places about Brundusia where Federik was retired; also Galipoli, Mantia, and Turpia.

Gilbert Bourbon Duke of Montpensier the kings Lieutenant in Naples.

The Realme of Naples beginneth to reclaime the name of the Aragons.

Now before the king departed from Naples, many things were in negociation betweene him and the Pope, not without great hope of concord: In which action was sent from the Pope to the king, and after returned to Rome the Cardinall S. Denis, and for the French king, M. Frances. For the king desired greatly the inuestiture of Naples, and that the Pope, if he would not ioyne with him, at the least that he would not be for his enemies, and that he would receiue him into Rome as a friend. To which demands, albeit at the beginning the Pope bare some inclinatiō, yet, distrusting much in himselfe of the king, and esteeming that to separate himselfe from the Confederates, and consent to the inuestiture, would be supposed a meane sufficient to make a faithfull reconciliation with him, he obiected many difficulties to the other demands; and to that of the inuestiture, (albeit the king would condescend to take it vnder this condition, not to be preiudiciall to the rights of another) he answered, that he wished the lawes might be looked into afore, to see to whom the right appertained: And on the other side, seeking to giue impediment by force to the kings entry into Rome, he sent to the state of Venice, and to the Duke of Millan, to furnish him with succours and strength of souldiers; who, immediatly sent him a thousand light horsemen, and two thousand footmen, with promise of an aide of a thousand men at armes: with which bands, ioyned to his owne forces, he hoped to be able to make resistance. But the Venetians and the Duke of Millan considering afterwards, that it was a thing too dangerous to send their strength and companies so farre from their owne estates, seeing that the whole armie agreed vpon was not yet in order, and that part of their people were occupied in the enterprise of Asti; and withall remembring the infidelitie of the Pope, who when king Charles past that way, called Ferdinand into Rome with his armie, and suddenly changing aduice, made him issue forth againe: they began to perswade him to withdraw himselfe to some place of suretie, rather then to aduenture his person to so great a danger in striuing to defend Rome; seeing that when the king should enter the citie, he would as quickly be gone, without leauing any body therein; which would so much the more increase the kings hopes to come to some composition with him.

The French king departed from Naples the twentieth day of May: but for that he had not yet taken the Crowne with the ceremonies accuſtomed, a few dayes afore his departure, he was ſolemnly crowned in the Cathedral Church, and receiued with great pompe and glory the honours, oathes, and homages, accuſtomed to be done to new kings. At this coronation, the oration was pronounced in the name of all the people of Naples by Iohn Iouian Pontan, to whoſe prayſes very cleare and ſhining for the excellency of his doctrine, his life, and ciuilitie of manners, this action brought no ſmall diſgrace; for that hauing bene of long a principall Secretarie to the kings of Aragon, and in very great authoritie with them, and the teacher and maiſter of Alphonſo, he ſeemed (whether it were to obſerue iuſtly the parts proper to Oratours, or to ſhew his affection to the French) to take too great libertie to ſpeake in the diſpraiſe and derogation of the kings by whom he had bene ſo much aduanced. So hard it is ſometimes for a man to keepe in himſelfe that moderation and thoſe rules, which he flowing with ſo great doctrine, had taught vnto others, writing of morall vertues, and by his wit and knowledge had made himſelfe wonderfull to the world in all kind of learning. The king led with him eight hundred French lances, the two hundred Gentlemen of his guard, an hundred lances vnder the Lord Triuulce, three thouſand Swiſſers footmen, a thouſand French men, and a thouſand Gaſcoins; hauing ordained that in Tuſkane Camilla Vitelli & his brethren ſhould ioyne with him with two hundred & fiftie men at armes, and that the armie by ſea ſhould draw towards Liuorne. Virginio Vrſin and the Count Petillane followed the king without other guard then their faith giuen not to go away without leaue: & for that they reaſoned that they were not iuſtly made priſoners, their cauſe had bene diſputed in the kings Councell, afore whom they alledged, that at the time they yeelded themſelues, the king had not onely granted to thoſe that they ſent, but alſo ſet downe in writing vnder his owne ſignature, their ſafeconduct; whereof being aduertiſed by their ſolicitors, which attended the diſpatch of the Secretaries, they had vnder that truſt, at the ſummons of the firſt Herald that went to Nola, diſplaied the enſignes of the king, and giuen the keyes to the firſt Captaine hauing with him but a few horſemen, when as they hauing more then foure hundred men at armes might eaſily haue made reſiſtance. Further, they alledged the ancient deuotion of the family of Vrſins, who taking part alwaies with the faction of the Guelffes, had euer borne both in themſelues and in all the predeceſſors of that houſe, perpetuall impreſſions of honour, reuerence, and ſeruice, to the Crowne of France: That for thoſe regards it came to paſſe, that with ſo great a readineſſe they had receiued the kings Maieſtie into their eſtates bordering vpon Rome: and therefore it was neither conuenient nor iuſt, both in regard of the faith giuen by the king, and of their deportments, that they ſhould be holden priſoners. But they were anſwered with no leſſe roundneſſe by Monſieur de Ligny, whoſe ſouldiers tooke them within Nola: That the ſafeconduct, albeit it was determined and ſubſigned by the king, yet it is to be vnderſtood, that it was not perfectly giuen, but when it was confirmed with the kings ſeale, and with the ſeale of the Secretarie, and ſo deliuered to the partie: That in all grants and letters pattents ſuch was the ancient cuſtome in all Courts, to the end that if any thing were inconſideratly paſſed the mouth of the Prince, by reaſon of many thoughts and affaires, or for not ſufficient information of things, it might ſo be moderated: And that the confidence of that moued them not to yeeld to ſo ſmall a company of ſouldiers, but they did communicate in the generall neceſſitie and feare, for that there remained no meane either to defend or to flie, the whole countrey about them ſwarming with the armies of the victors: That what they alledged of their merits was falſe, which if it ſhould be affirmed by another, themſelues ought to denie it for their honour: for that it was manifeſt to all the world, that not of will or free conſent, but to auoyd danger (leauing in aduerſity the Aragons, of whom in proſperitie they had receiued great benefits) they agreed to giue the king paſſage through their lands: ſeeing therefore they were in pay of the enemy, and bare minds eſtranged from the nature of the French, and that they had perfectly no ſafeconduct or ſuretie, they were made priſoners by good law and right of armes. Theſe reaſons thus auouched againſt the Vrſins, and ſuſtained by the power of Monſieur de Ligny, and authoritie of the Colonnoys, who aſwell for ancient enuies, as for the diuerſitie of the factions, quarrelled them openly: there was no reſolution nor ſentence, onely they were commanded to follow the king, yet giuing them hope to be deliuered when his Maieſtie was come to Aſt.

The French king crowned king of Naples.

Their reaſons are diſproued by Monſieur de Ligny.

But the Pope, (the Confederates hauing counſelled him to go his way) though he were not without without inclination to be reconciled with the king, with whom he negotiated continually: yet in the end ſuſpition and ielouſie preuailing with him, though he had nouriſhed the king with hopes that he would attend him; after he had beſtowed a ſufficient garriſon within the Caſtell S. Ange, two dayes before the king ſhould enter Rome, he went to Oruiette, accompanied with the Colledge of Cardinals, and two hundred men at armes, a thouſand light horſemen, and three thouſand footmen: and he left behind him as Legat, the Cardinall of S. Anaſtaſio, to receiue and honour the king, who entred by that quarter on the further ſide of Tyber, to the end to auoid the Caſtell S. Ange: and refuſing the lodging that was offered him by the Popes commiſſion in the Pallace of the Vatican, he went and lodged in the ſuburbes. And when the Pope vnderſtood that the king came neare to Viterbe, notwithſtanding he entertained him with new hopes to meete with him in ſome place conuenient betweene Viterbe and Oruiette, he left Oruiette and went to Perouſe, with intention (if the king tooke that way) to go to Ancona, the better to haue meanes, by the commoditie of the ſea, to retire to ſome place abſolutely aſſured. And yet the king although he were very angry with him, rendred the Caſtels of Ciuitauecchia and Terracina, reſeruing Oſtia, which when he came out of Italie, he gaue vp to the power of the Cardinall of S. Peter ad vincula, who was Biſhop thereof. He paſſed in like ſort by the countreys of the Church, as through the dominions of a friend; ſauing that they of Tuskanella refuſing to receiue into their towne his vantguard, the ſouldiers tooke it by force, and ſacked it, not without the ſlaughter of many.

After this, the king remained without any occaſion at Sienna ſixe dayes, not conſidering (neither of himſelfe, nor by the earneſt aduertiſements of the Cardinall of S. Peter ad vincula, and of Triuulce) how hurtfull it was to giue time to his enemies to make their prouiſions and vnite their forces: neither did he recompence the loſſe of time, with the profite of counſels or deliberations. For there was debated at Sienna the reſtitution of the fortreſſes of the Florentines promiſed by the king at his departure from Naples, and many times after confirmed on the way: and therefore, the Florentines, beſides that they were ready to pay the thirty thouſand duckats remaining of the ſumme agreed at Florence, offered to lend ſeuenty thouſand more, and to ſend with him till he were arriued at Aſt, Franciſco Secco their Captaine with three hundred men at armes, and two thouſand footmen: ſo that the neceſſity which the king had of money, the great commodity to augment his army, and the conſideration of his faith and othe, induced almoſt all thoſe of his Councell to perſwade effectually the reſtitution of the Caſtels and peeces of ſtrength, reſeruing Pietraſanta and Serezana, as fit meanes to draw more eaſily to his deuotion the hearts of the Genowais. But it was a reſolution in deſtinie, that the matter of new calamities ſhould remaine kindled in Italie. For, Monſieur de Ligny, a man both yong and wanting experience, but being borne of one of the ſiſters of the kings mother, and of no ſmall fauours with him, puſhed forward either by his lightneſſe, or elſe with diſdaine for that the Florentines addreſſed themſelues to the Cardinall of S. Mallo, hindered this deliberation, alledging no other reaſon then the pitie and compaſſion of the Piſans: And touching the offer of the forces which the Florentines made, he deſpiſed them, vanting that the army of France was able to fight with all the men of warre in Italie knit in one ſtrength: and Monſieur de Pienes was a ſupporter of his opinion, for that he thought the king would beſtow vpon him the iuriſdiction of Piſa and Liuorne. There was debating alſo at Sienna of the gouernement of that City, for that many of the orders of the people and of the reformers (to plucke downe the brotherhood of the order of Montenoue,) made inſtance, that erecting a new forme of gouernement, the guard which they of Montenoue kept at the publike Pallace might be taken away, and the place ſupplied by a guard of French men vnder the leading of Monſieur de Ligny: And albeit this counſell was reiected in the councell of the king, as a thing of litle continuance, and impertinent to the time preſent; Monſieur de Ligny who had laid a vaine plot to make himſelfe Lord of it, obtained that the king would take into his protection that City vnder certaine conditions, binding himſelfe to the defence of it & all the dependances except Montpulcian, which he ſaid he would not intangle himſelfe withall, neither for the Florentines nor for the Siennois: And the communaltie of Sienna (albeit no mention was made of any ſuch thing in the capitulation) choſe, by the conſent of the king, Monſieur de Ligny for their Captaine, promiſing him twenty thouſand duckats by yeare, vpon condition, that he would keepe there a Lieutenant with three hundred footmen for the guard of the place; which ſtrength he left there called out of ſuch as were of the French army. The vanitie of which deliberations appeared immediatly, for that the Order of Montenoue hauing eſtſoones reconquered with armes their authority accuſtomed, chaſed out of Sienna the guard, and diſmiſſed Monſieur de Liſle whom the king had left there for his Ambaſſadour.

But there were now great ſtirres and emotions in Lombardie: for the Venetians, and Lodowike Sforce (who had euen then receiued from the Emperour with much ſolemnity the priuiledges of inueſtiture of the Duchie of Millan, and made publike homage and oath of fidelity to the Ambaſſadours that brought them) raiſed great preparations to ſtop the king that he ſhould not returne into France, or at leaſt to aſſure the Duchie of Millan, to come to the which he muſt paſſe ouer ſo great a circuit of countreis. To theſe ends, euery of them readdreſſed their forces, and leauied of new, partly in cõmon, & partly at expences ſeparate, many men at armes, obtaining after many difficulties, that Iohn Bentiuole whom they had taken into their common pay, ſhould ſticke to the league with the City of Bolognia. Lodowike armed at Genes for the guard of the ſame City, ten gallies at his owne charge, and foure great ſhips at the common expences of the Pope, the Venetians, and himſelfe: and being at the point to execute that whereunto he was bound by the couenants of the confederation touching the towne of Aſt, he ſent into Germanie to leauie two thouſand footmen, and conuerted to that enterpriſe Galeas S. Seuerin with ſeuen hundred men at armes, and three thouſand footmen: inſomuch as aſſuring him of the taking of that towne, and to atchieue all things to his honour, (as he was naturally very inſolent in his proſperities) he ſent this meſſage to the Duke of Orleans the more to terrifie him: That hereafter he ſhould forbeare to vſurpe the title of Duke of Millan, which title Charles his father had taken ſince the death of Philip Maria Viſcounte: That he ſhould not ſuffer new bands to paſſe out of France into Italie: That he ſhould cauſe to returne home againe ſuch as were already within the towne of Aſt: And that for the aſſurance of theſe things, he ſhould put the towne of Aſt into the hands of Galeas S. Seuerin, in whom the king might repoſe truſt as well as in him, hauing the yeare before bene receiued by the king into the brotherhood and Order of S. Michael in France; magnifying beſides, and boaſting of his forces; of the prouiſions the Cõfederates made to make head againſt the king in Italie; the great preparations of the Emperour and the king of Spaine to moue warre beyond the Mounts. But the Duke of Orleans was made nothing afraid with theſe vaine threats: for as ſoone as he vnderſtood they were about to make a new confederation, he purpoſed to ſort the Aſt, and ſolicited with great inſtance to ſend out of France new ſupplies; who, vnderſtanding that they were to be employed in the proper ſuccours of the kings perſon, began with great diligence to paſſe the mounts. By reaſon whereof the Duke of Orlans not fearing his enemies, marched into the field, and tooke in the Marquiſdome of Saluce the towne and Caſtell of Galſinieres which Anthony Maria of S. Seuerin poſſeſſed. Which being knowne to Galeas, who had a litle before taken certaine ſmall villages, he retired with his army to Anon, a towne of the Duchie of Millan neare to Aſt, neither hauing hope to be able to offend, nor feare to be offended. But the nature of Lodowike being much inclined to entangle himſelfe with enterpriſes which required great expences, and on the contrarie, to ſhun euen in the greateſt dangers the ſame coſts and charges, was the occaſion to bring his eſtate into right great dangers: for that by reaſon of his very ſpare and needy paiments, a very few footmen came out of Germany, and for the ſame niggardneſſe, the bands that were with Galeas diminiſhed daily: on the contrary the ſupplies of France increaſed continually, who for that they were called to the reſcue of the kings perſon, marched with ſuch diligence, that the Duke of Orleans had already aſſembled three hundred lances, three thouſand Swiſſers footmen, and three thouſand Gaſcoines. And albeit the king had preciſely commanded him, that abſtaining from all enterpriſe, he ſhould ſtand vpon continuall readineſſe to meete him whenſoeuer he ſhould be ſent for; yet (it being hard for a man not to make reckoning of his proper profite) he determined to accept the occaſion to poſſeſſe himſelfe of the citie of Nouare, wherein he was offred to be put by two of the Opizins, Gentlemen of the ſame citie, hating much the Duke of Millan, for that as well from them as from many other of the towne, he had by falſe accuſations and vniuſt iudgement, vſurped certaine conduits of waters and other poſſeſſions. The enterpriſe and the manner of it being reſolued vpon, the Duke of Orleans paſſed by night the riuer of Po at the bridge Stura, within the iuriſdiction of the Marquis of Montferrat, hauing in his company the Marquis of Saluce: he was receiued by the conſpiratours of the enterpriſe into the towne with all

all his forces, and found no reſiſtance: and from thence making ſuddaine incurſions with part of his horſemen euen vntil Vigeuena, it was beleeued that if he had drawne his whole army with ſpeed towards Millan, there would haue riſen no ſmall inſurrections; for that the loſſe of Nouaro kindled in the Millanois a wonderfull inclination to reuolt and change; and Lodowike, no leſſe timerous in aduerſitie, then inſolent in proſperitie, was ſeene with teares vnprofitable to acknowledge his cowardize (as for the moſt part inſolency is ioyned with timerouſneſſe:) they alſo that were with Galeas, in whom onely conſiſted his defence, remaining behind; ſhewed themſelues in no place to his reſcue. But becauſe the conditions and diſorders of an enemy, are not alwaies knowne to the Captaines, it happeneth often in warres that many goodly occaſions are loſt; there being alſo no apparence that ſo ſudden a mutation could ſucceed againſt ſo great a Prince. The Duke of Orleans, to aſſure the conqueſt of Nouaro, determined to haue the Caſtel, which the fifth day accorded to yeeld, if within foure and twenty houres it were not ſuccoured: during which time, Galeas de S. Seuerin had leaſure to conuey his companies to Vigeuena, and the Duke (who the better to reconcile the minds of the people, had by proclamation called in many exactions impoſed afore vpon the communalty) good reſpite to increaſe his army. And albeit the Duke of Orleans hauing ranged his bands neare the walles of Vigeuena, offered battell to his enemies, on whom fell ſo generall aſtoniſhment, that they were vpon the point to abandon the towne, and paſſe the riuer of Theſin by a bridge they had made vpon boates, and other matter neceſſary to their ſuccours in the paſſage; the enemy refuſing to fight, the Duke of Orleans retired to Trecas. From this time the affaires of Lodowike Sforce began to proſper, many ſupplies of horſemen and footmen arriuing in his army. For the Venetians being content that the charge to meete the French King, ſhould be in effect to them alone, cõſented that Lodowike ſhould call backe part of thoſe bands he had ſent vpon the coaſts of Parmeſan, and withall they refurniſhed him with foure hundred light horſe: ſo that the meane to paſſe further, was taken from the Duke of Orleans, who making a road with fiue hundred horſemen euen to Vigeuena, and the horſemen of the enemy encountring with them, a great loſſe light vpon the Duk of Orleans. This encounter gaue courage to Galeas de S. Seuerin, both ſuperiour in forces, and nothing inferiour in fortune, to preſent battell to the Duke at Trecas. At length all the army being aſſembled (wherein beſides the Italian ſouldiers, was arriued a thouſand horſemen, and a thouſand footmen of Almains) incamped within a mile of Nouaro, whither the Duke of Orleans was retired with all his companies.

The newes of the reuolt of Nouaro, procured the King being then at Sienna, to come forward: and therefore to auoid all occaſions that might hinder his departure; and knowing well that the Florentines, warned by the perils paſt, and falne into new iealouſies, for that Peter de Medicis followed him, albeit they had determined to receiue him into Florence with great honours, yet for their more ſurety, had filled their towne with men of armes and piked bands; he drew to Piſa by the lands of the Florentines, leauing the City of Florence on the right hand: and in the towne of Poggibonſe met him Ieronimo Sauonarola, who according to his cuſtome, vſing the name and authority of God to his purpoſe, told him roundly that he ought to reſtore to the Florentines their townes, ioyning to his perſwaſions, threatnings abſolute and terrible, that if he obſerued not that he had ſworne with ſo great ſolemnity, vpon the holy Goſpels, and as it were afore the eies of God, a ſeuere puniſhment would ſhortly follow vpon him. The King made him ſundry anſwers, according to his inconſtancy; now promiſing to make reſtitution as ſoone as he was come to Piſa; and immediatly (wreſting his promiſe and oath) he ſaid he had ſworne to the Piſans, to protect their libertie, afore he made any oath at Florence: and yet he gaue hopes alwaies to their Embaſſadours for the reſtitution of their peeces as ſoone as he was come to Piſa. At Piſa the matter was eftſoones proponed in the kings Councell, for that the bruite of the preparations, vnity and ſtrength of the Confederates about the borders of Parma increaſing daily, they began to looke into the difficulties to paſſe through Lombardy: for which cauſe many deſired the moneys and other ſuccors offered by the Florentines. But to their aduice were contrary euen thoſe Captaines and gentlemen who had reſiſted it at Sienna: alledging, that albeit there happened by the oppoſition of the enemy, any diſorder or difficulty to paſſe through Lombardy, yet it were better to haue in their power the City of Piſa (whither they might retire) then to leaue it in the hands of the Florentines, who, hauing once reobtained the places they demanded, would be of no better faith, then had bene the other Italians; and adding withall, Castanarola with all the other townes of the countrey of Faenza; then they went and incamped before Russi, which is a borough situate betweene Faenza and Rauenna, but not easie to be taken, for that besides it was enuironed with very large and deepe trenches, it was defended with fixe hundred footmen forreiners: but that which made it more hard to be taken, was, that there was not in the Church armie, neither that counsell, nor that concord that was necessarie, notwithstanding it abounded in strength and forces, three thousand Swissers payed by the Pope being there newly arriued. For this cause, albeit the Venetians were not strong in Romagna, yet things had no great aduancement on that side: onely Iohn the Greeke Captaine of the estradiots issuing out of Rauenna with his bands, was broken and taken prisoner by Iohn Vitelli one of the Captaines of the Church: and at last, after they had remained ten dayes afore Russi, they tooke it by composition. And the victory of the King hapning in the same time, the Citie of Faenza, who stood now in her owne power, for that the Venetian strength was already diminished, agreed to acknowledge the Pope for their Lord, if they were not rescued within fifteene dayes: by the benefite of which conuention there issued out of Faenza vnder the faith of the Legat, fiue hundred footmen of the Venetians, who were stripped by commandement of the Duke of Vrbin. The Citie of Rauenna did the like as soone as the armie approched. Thus, more by the reputation of the victorie of the French King, then by his proper forces, the Pope conquered in a litle time, those townes which he had so long desired in Romagna, where the Venetians held no other peece then the Castle of Rauenna, against whom, euer since the ouerthrow of their armie, they discouered dayly new enemies. For, the Duke of Ferrara, who till that day had not declared himselfe, chased out of Ferrara the Vicedomino, a magistrate which the Venetians kept resident there, according to the ancient conuentions, to minister equitie to the subiects: and taking armes, he recouered without impediment Polesina de Rouigna, and sunke with artilleries the Venetian Nauies floting vpon the riuer of Adice: and to the Marquis of Mantua were yeelded the townes of Asola and Lunato, which the Venetians had taken in the warre they had against Philip Maria Viscount, from Iohn Francis de Gonsagua his great grandfather. In Istria, Christopher Frangipan occupied Pisinia and Diuinia: and the Duke of Brunswike, who by Cæsars commandement was entred into Friul with two thousand men trained, tooke Feltro and Bellona; at whose comming, together with the bruite of the victorie of the French, Triesta with the other townes (the conquest of which had bene the very welspring and beginning of all the aduersities of the Venetians) returned vnder the obedience of Cæsar. In like sort the Counts of Lodron occupied certain Castles and hamlets that were neare them; and the Bishop of Trent vsurped Riua and Agresta. But there was nothing that so much amazed the Venetians since the battell of Vaile, as the taking of the Castle of Pesquiero, whose strength and situation, with other oportunities of the place, they supposed would haue stayed the furie of the victor.

Conquests of Maximilian vpon the Venetians.

The Venetians then standing amazed amidst so many perils, being fearefull that the King would passe further; and their condition being made so desperate, that the feare that possessed them, left them no libertie of counsell; and their bands which were retired to Mestre (amongst whom was neither obedience nor order) being reduced to a very small number; they determined (and haply too soone) to abandon the iurisdiction of the firme land, to the end not to haue so many enemies, and no lesse to take from the French King all occasions to draw neare to Venice. For they were not without suspition, that in that Citie would rise some tumult, either by the people, or by the innumerable multitude of strangers that dwelt there: these, for desire of prey and pillage; the other, for that they being Citizens borne by long succession of time in the same Citie, and most of them of the same bloud and families, would not endure the depriuation of honours, and to be in all things in a maner subiect to the Gentlemen. And in so great a despaire and losse of courage, this reason was alledged in the Senate, that if willingly they abandoned the gouernment to eschue the euils present, they should easily recouer it with the returne of a better fortune: for that the peoples that had bene willingly separate from them, would not make so strong resistance to returne eftsoones vnder the obedience of their ancient Lords, as they would do if they had openly rebelled. For these reasons the magnanimity of the Venetians being troden vnder foote, together with the reputation of so glorious a Commonweale, they were content to keepe to themselues the salt waters onely, addressing to the magistrates and officers that were in Padua, Verona, and all the other townes destinated to Maximilian, directions to returne with speed, and leaue the townes to the deuotion of the peoples. And besides this, to the end to obtaine peace with Maximilian vnder what conditions soeuer, they sent to him with diligence their Embassadour Iustinian, who being admitted to his presence in publike audience, spake very pitifully and with great submission, but in vaine, for that Cæsar denied to make any contract without the priuitie of the French King. But the better to make knowne how much the Commonweale of Venice was humbled and abated of courage, not feeling the like aduersities in two hundred yeares before, it cannot be impertinent to expresse here the selfe Oration which their Embassadour vttered afore Cæsar; onely turning the Latine words into our vulgar tongue: the tenor whereof is as followeth.

the

The Oration of Anth. Iustinian to Cæsar.

It is most certaine and true (most puissant Cæsar) that the ancient Philosophers and wise men of those times, were not deceiued when they affirmed, that the true, firme, eternall and immortall glorie, was for a man to conquer himselfe: an action which they preferred aboue all kingdomes, trophees and triumphs. For this vertue Scipio (so much renowmed for his many victories) carried more reputation, then for subduing Afrike, or vanquishing Carthage. Hath not this same vertue immortalized Alexander the Great, when Darius, being ouerthrowne by him in a mightie battell, besought the immortall Gods to preserue his kingdome, but if they had otherwise decreed, that he might haue no other successor then so gentle an enemie, and so gracious a conquerer? Cæsar the Dictator, of whom you beare the surname, and communicate in his fortunes, as well as in his liberalities, clemencies, and other vertues, was he not worthily numbred among the gods, for that he remitted, released, and pardoned? Lastly, the Senate and people of Rome, the daunter of the whole world, whose imperie in earth is onely in you, and whose maiestie and greatnesse is seene in your person, hath it not brought more peoples and prouinces vnder their subiection by clemencie, equitie and mildnesse, then with armes and warre? And seeing it is thus, it shall not be numbred amongst the least of your praises, if your Maiestie, in whose hands stands the victorie gotten ouer the Venetians, looking into the frailtie of worldly things, shall vse it with moderation, and incline rather to the deuices and studies of peace, then to the doubtfull euents of warre. For touching the inconstancie of humane things, how incertaine, how doubfull, how mutable, how deceitfull, and how full of dangers is the estate of mortall men, I need not proue by examples strange, forreine or ancient, since the Commonweale of Venice stands at this houre the true figure and representation thereof, which not long since was so mightie, resplendent, renowned, as that our name and reputation could not be contained within the limites of Europe onely, but with great pompe and magnificence, ran through all Afrike and Asia, and with great bruite resounded euen to the vttermost bounds of the earth: but now by the onely losse of a battell, both light and easie, is depriued of the praise and merite of armes, and become despoiled of riches, rent in peeces, ouerthrowne, and standing in need of all things, and especially of counsell, and so reuersed and abated, that there remaines no signe of our ancient vertue. But doublesse the French men beguile themselues, if they attribute these things to their vertue; since notwithstanding we haue bene heretofore trauelled by so many afflictions, wasted and consumed with so many dangers and ruines, yet we neuer lost courage, & then chiefly when with great danger we managed warre many yeares against the most cruell Tyrant of the Turkes, but alwayes of men vanquished, we became victorious: and we should now also haue hoped to do the like, had not the bruite of the terrible name of your Maiestie, together with the liuely and inuincible vertue of your souldiers, so abated the minds of vs all, that there remaines no hope, I say not, to vanquish, but not to defend: and therefore casting downe our armes, we haue reposed all our hope in the vnspeakable clemencie or rather diuine pietie of your Maiestie, which we doubt not to find euen in the greatest despaire of our affaires. In which respect, as well on the behalfe of the Prince and Senate, as of the people and communaltie of Venice, we pray, beseech, and coniure you, to vouchsafe to cast the eyes of your mercie vpon our afflictions, and to cure our griefes with remedies of comfort and consolation: we are willing to embrace all such conditions of peace as you shall please to offer vs, and hold them reasonable, righteous and iust: but perhaps we are worthy to taxe our selues. To you as true and lawfull Lord, we offer restitution of all those things which our elders haue taken from the sacred Empire, and Duchie of Austria: wherunto (that they may come the more decently) we adde all that we possesse in the firme land, renouncing all rights thereunto, in whatsoeuer sort we haue gotten them. Besides this, we will acknowledge a yearely paiment to your Maiestie and your lawfull successors in the Empire, of fiftie thousand duckats for euer: We will readily obey you in all your commandements, haue-

" decrees and appointments. Defend vs, we beseech you, from the insolencie of those, who earst " were our companions in armes, and now do proue our bitter enemies, desiring nothing more " then the ruine of the Venetian name: for being preserued by your clemencie, we shall call you " the father and founder of our Citie, we shall write it in our Annales, and continually report to " our children your great merites and vertues: and it will be no small increase of your praises, to " say, that you are the first Prince afore whose feete the Commonweale of Venice falls prostrate, " before whom we bow our neckes, and whom we honour, reuerence, and respect as a God. If " Almightie God had so inspired the minds of our ancestors, that they had forborne to meddle " with that which belonged to others, our flourishing Commonweale had far surmounted all the " Cities of Europe, which now lies couered with filth, pollution and putrifaction, deformed with " infamie and reproach, full of derision and contumely, and hath in a moment lost the honour " of all the victories formerly gotten. But now to returne to my first purpose, it is in your power, " by pardoning and forgiuing the Venetians, to win such reputation and honour, greater or more " renowmed then which, no man euer obtained by any victorie; which no age, no prescription or " antiquitie, no law of time nor course of yeares, shall be able to wipe out of the minds and me- " mories of men; but all ages shall call, proclaime and confesse you to be the most pious, cour- " teous, and most renowmed Prince of the world: and we your Venetians, shall attribute to your " vertue, to your felicitie, and to your goodnesse, that we liue, that we breathe, or that we en- " ioy the companie of men.

The Venetians according to this deliberation sent into Powilla, to restore the ports to the King of Aragon, who knowing how to enioy the fruites of other mens trauels without expences or danger, had dispatched into Spaine a small Nauie, which had commanded certaine places appertaining to those Cities and hauens of the sea. They dispatched also into Romagna a publike Secretarie, with commission, to giue vp to the Pope all that they held there, vpon condition that Iohn Paul Manfron and other prisoners might be restored, and that they might haue libertie to draw out their artilleries, and that the people that were within the Castle of Rauenna might depart in safetie. Which conditions whilest the Pope made difficultie to accept, for that he would not displease the Confederates, the Castle of Rauenna was rendred, the souldiers giuing it vp of themselues, notwithstanding the Venetian Secretarie that was entred, sought to hinder it, for that such as solicited for them at Rome, gaue hope that the Pope in the end would consent to the conditions, vnder the which they had offered restitution. But the Pope complained much that they had shewed a greater contumacie against him then against Cæsar or the King of Aragon: and therefore when Grimani and Cornaro the Venetian Cardinals demanded absolution of the Bull, in the name of the Senate, as being due, for that they had offered restitution within the terme of foure and twentie dayes, he made answer, that they had not obeyed, because their offer was not simple, but ioyned to conditions limited; and for that they were admonished ouer and besides the restitution of the townes, to yeeld account of the fruites they had receiued, together with the Benefices they possessed appertaining to Churches or to persons Ecclesiastical.

In this sort was ouerwhelmed with a wonderfull furie, the estate of the Commonweale of Venice, one calamitie continually growing vpon another, all the hopes they proposed vnto themselues failing, and no signe remaining, by the which after the losse of so great a dominion, they might hope for the preseruation of their proper libertie. This so great a ruine touched diuersly the minds of the Italians, of whom many receiued great contentment, remebring that the Venetians, proceeding in too great ambition, without respect to iustice or obseruatiō of faith, seizing vpon all things that occasion offered them, had manifestly aspired to the monarchie of all Italy: things which made their names hatefull to all men, and the more odious for the generall bruite of the pride and haughtinesse of that people. On the other side, many who considered more soundly the present estate of things, and how wretched and foule it were for all Italy to be wholly brought vnder the yoke of strangers, felt no litle griefe, that such a Citie, so ancient a seate of libertie, and the glorie of the Italian name through all the world, should fall into such extremitie, that so worthy a member should be cut off, which more then all the residue had bene the protectour of their common glorie and renowne. But aboue all, so great a fall and declination began to be grieuous to the Pope, who doubting the powers of Cæsar and the French King, desired to alter their thoughts from oppressing him, by intangling them with affaires. In which regard he determined (but secretly) to do all he could, that the aduersities of the Commonweale

of Venice ſhould haue no further courſe, and he accepted the letters written to him in the name of the Duke of Venice, by the which he beſought him in great ſubmiſſion, to receiue the ſix Embaſſadours ſent to him of the principals of the Senate, humbly to intreate him to pardon and abſolue them. Theſe letters being read, and their petitions publiſhed in the Conſiſtorie, he conſented to admit them, after he had in few words proteſted, that it was not the ancient cuſtome of the Church, to ſhew her ſelfe hard or rigorous to ſuch as with repentance of their faults, ſought for pardon. The Embaſſadours of the Emperour and the French ſtriued what they could againſt it, putting him in memory, that by the confederation of Cambray, he was expreſly bound to perſecute them with armes ſpirituall and temporall, till euery one of the Confederates had recouered that which appertained to him: to whom the Pope made anſwer, that he had conſented to admit them, with intention not to giue them abſolution, if firſt Cæſar (who onely had not recouered all) had not obtained the things that belonged to him. This gaue ſome beginning to the hope and ſuretie of the Venetians; but that which aſſured them moſt in their laſt feare, was the reſolution of the French King, to obſerue ſimply and in good fidelitie the capitulation which he had made with Cæſar: and hauing reconquered all that was his, to paſſe no further with his armie, nor breake his limites. And therefore albeit it was in his power after he had taken Peſquiero, not onely to accept Verona, which had ſent Embaſſadours to yeeld to him, but alſo to occupie Padua without any impediment, together with all the other townes abandoned by the Venetians: yet he would, in any ſort, that the Embaſſadours of Verona ſhould preſent the keyes of their towne to the Embaſſadours of Cæſar which were in his armie, and for that cauſe he ſtayed with all his campe at Peſquiero, which he retained for himſelfe, for the commoditie of the place, notwithſtanding it appertained to the Marquis of Mantua, (the Venetians hauing taken that together with Aſula and Lunato from him) who durſt not refuſe it to the King, leauing to him the reuenues of the towne, with promiſe of recompence. At the ſame time the King had alſo by accord the Caſtle of Cremona, vnder condition that all the ſouldiers ſhould depart with goods and life ſaued, except ſuch as were his ſubiects; and that the Gentlemen of Venice ſhould remaine his priſoners, to whom he gaue his faithful promiſe to ſaue their liues. Vincenſa and Padua followed the example of Verona, as alſo the other townes, except the Citie of Treuiſa, which being abandoned by the magiſtrates and ſouldiers of Venice, had runne the ſame courſe, if Cæſar had ſent thither neuer ſo ſmall a force, or at leaſt any perſonage of authoritie. But Leonard de Dreſſino, one of the exiles of Vincenſa, going thither to receiue it, without ſtrength or armes, and without any maieſtie of imperie, as he had receiued Padua in the like ſort; and being entred and admitted; the exiles of the ſame Citie being newly reſtored by the Venetians (and which for this benefite became louers of their name) began to draw into tumult, by whoſe example the people being affected to the gouernment of Venice, roſe and conſpired with one called Marke a ſhoomaker, who publiſhing himſelfe chiefe, and with great cries and concourſe of the commons, carrying into the principall places the banners of the Venetians, they cried with one voice, S. Marke, aſſuring that they would acknowledge no other Empire nor other Lord. To this action was much helping an Embaſſadour of the King of Hungarie, who in his way to Venice, paſſing by Treuiſa, and being throwne haply into this tumult, perſwaded the inhabitants not to rebell. In ſo much that after they had chaſed out Dreſſino, and put into the Citie ſeuen hundred footmen of the Venetians, the armie alſo enting a litle after, which was now increaſed with bands of footmen coming from Slauonia, with the remainders of the armie returned from Romagna, hauing an intention to incampe in ſome ſtrong place betweene Margueta and Meſtra: they fortified the towne in great diligence, and made their horſemen ſcoure the places of the countrey thereabouts, procuring from all parts great reliefe of victuals, as well for the neceſſitie of that Citie, as for the vſe of the towne of Venice, whereof they gathered great quantities from all ſides. The principall occaſion of this accident, and to confirme in the Venetians a hope to retaine yet ſome part of their dominion, together with many other great aduentures that followed, was the negligence and diſordered gouernment of Cæſar, of whom in ſo great a courſe of victorie there was heard no other thing then the name, notwithſtanding by the means of the French armes, and for feare thereof, ſo many townes had bene rendred to him, which were very eaſie for him to keepe. But after the confederation made at Cambray, he ſtayed ſome time in Flanders, to leuie of the people a loane of money to furniſh his warres, which he had no ſooner got into his poſſeſſion, then, according to his cuſtome, he ſpent it vnprofitably: and albeit at his his departing from Macklin in armes, and with all the pompe and ceremonies imperiall, and after being come very neare to Italy, he made publication that he would begin the warre before the terme appointed to him in the capitulation: yet being oppreſſed with his accuſtomed difficulties and confuſions, he aduanced no further, notwithſtanding the Pope ſolicited him with great importunities, for the feare he had of the French armes; and though he had ſent him (to giue him a more life to the enterpriſe, by Conſtantine of Macedonia) fiftie thouſand duckats, and conſented withall to the hundred thouſand duckats which had bene leuied certaine yeares afore in Germanie, which were reſerued to make warre vpon the Turkes. Beſides all this, he had receiued of the French King an hundred thouſand duckats for the inueſtiture of the Duchie of Millan, and was aduertiſed of the fortune of the battell of Vailo as he drew neare to Inſpruch: and notwithſtanding he had with great diligẽce diſpatched the Duke of Brunſwike to recouer Friul, yet he moued not (as in ſo great an occaſion had bene conuenient) for want of money (the taxes which he had receiued and drawne from ſo many places not being able to ſuffice his prodigalities.) At laſt he arriued at Trent, from whence writing letters congratulatorie to the King, he gaue many thanks that by his meanes he had recouered his townes: and the better to expreſſe the good will he bare to the King, and withall to wipe out all memories of offences paſt, it is ſaid, that he cauſed a booke to be burned which was kept at Spires, containing an authenticke regiſter of the iniuries which the French Kings in times paſt had done to the Empire and nation of Germanie. The Cardinall of Amboiſe came to him to Trent the thirteenth day of Iune, to communicate of their common affaires, who being receiued with great honour, promiſed him on the behalfe of his King, a ſuccour of 500 Lances: and after they had with great agreement giuen directions for other affaires, it was reſolued that Cæſar and the King ſhould ſpeake together in plaine field neare the towne of Gard, vpon the Marches of both their countreys. For which cauſe the French King prepared to be there at the day appointed, and Cæſar, for the ſame regard, came to Riua de Trent; but after he had bene there onely two houres, he returned immediatly to Trent, ſignifying to the French King, that by occaſion of new accidents hapned at Friul, he was conſtrained to depart ſuddenly, deſiring him to ſtay at Cremona, for he would returne ſpeedily to giue perfection to the enteruiew determined. This varietie (if it be poſſible to find out the truth in ſo great inconſtancie) many attributed to his credulitie and lightneſſe of beliefe, ſome hauing blowne into his eares matter that made him enter into ſuſpition: others made this the occaſion, that hauing ſo ſmall a Court, accompanied with a traine ill appointed, he thought he could not preſent himſelfe with that dignitie and reputation, as might hold compariſon with the pompe and greatneſſe of the French King. But the King deſiring to diſſolue his armie, to be deliuered of ſo great a burden, and no leſſe to returne with ſpeed into France, tooke his way to Millan, not tarrying for the Emperour, notwithſtanding the Biſhop of Gurcie, whom the Emperour had ſent for that effect, followed him euen to Gremona, ſoliciting him much to tarrie, and making promiſe that without all exceptions the Emperour would returne. The diſcamping of the armie and perſon of the French King from the confines of Cæſar, diminiſhed greatly the reputation of his affaires: and yet albeit he was accompanied with ſuch multitudes of men, that he might eaſily furniſh Padua and the other townes, yet he forbare to ſend garriſon thither, either for the inconſtancie of his nature, or that he thought aforehand to vndertake ſome other enterpriſes; or elſe for that he thought it more honorable, deſcending into Italy, to haue with him a very great armie: and which more is, he pretended (as though the former actions had had their due perfection) that together with the ioynt forces of the whole Confederates, they ſhould aſſaile the Citie of Venice: a matter very plauſible to the French King, but grieuous to the Pope, and no leſſe impugned by the King of Aragon.

The laſt action of the Florentines againſt the Piſans.

About this time the Florentines put their laſt hand to the warres againſt the Piſans. For after they had cut off all ſuccours and entries of graines into Piſa, they leuied new bands, to the end to hinder with all their induſtrie and power, all recourſe of victuals both by ſea and land; which could not eaſily be done for the neighbourhood of the countrey of the Lucquois; who, when they could ſecretly do it, obſerued with a very negligent faith their accord newly made with the Florentines. But the want of victuals increaſed dayly within Piſa, which when the people of the plaine countrey would no longer endure, thoſe principals of the Citizens, in whoſe hands reſted all publike reſolutions, being followed with the greateſt part of the youth of the Citie, the better to lull the countrey ſouldiers with accuſtomed deuices, introduced by the meane of the

Lord of Plombin, a practise of accord with the Florentines; wherein they artificially consumed many dayes, and for which the Florentines sent to Plombin, Nicholas Machiauel their Secretary, and many Embassadours of the Pisans, chosen as well of the Citizens, as of the people of the plaine countrey. It was very hard to inclose Pisa, for that it hath large fields, and full of ditches and marrishes, and the entrie of victuals could not be hindred by any easie meanes, specially by night, both for the diligence of the Lucquoys to furnish them, and the desperate minds of the Pisans, refusing no perill wherein was any oportunitie of prouision. But to ouercome these difficulties, the Florentine Captaines determined to deuide their armie into three parts, bestowing one part at Messana without the gate of Plagei, the second at Saint Peter de Rene and Saint Iames, ouer against the gate of Lucques, and the third was assigned to be neare the ancient Temple of Saint Peter d'Ingrado, standing betweene Pisa and the mouth of Arne; and in euery campe, being well fortified, they bestowed a thousand footmen, with conuenient numbers of horsemen. And to let that none should passe otier the mountaines by the way of the vale of Osola, which leadeth to the mount Saint Iulian, they built towards the great Hospitall a Bastion capable of two hundred and fiftie footmen. By these impediments the Pisans fell more and more into want of victuals, who seeking to get by policie that which they despaired to obtaine by force, deuised that Alphonso Mutolo a yong man of Pisa, of base condition, who being aforetime taken prisoner by the Florentine souldiers, and receiuing many pleasures of his keeper, should offer to be the instrument to make them surprise the gate that goeth to Lucques: their deuice bearing this meaning, that at the same time that the campe which was at Saint Iames should go by night to execute the enterprise, they would not onely oppresse it when one part was entred, but also would charge the other campes of the Florentines, which according to the resolution were to approch more neare the Citie. But for that they made not their approch rashly nor in disorder, the Pisans won no other thing by this practise, but the liues of certaine particulars, who at the signe giuen, were come to the first gate, thinking to enter the Citie; amongst whom was slaine Canaio de Pratouecchio (so was he called, to whom Alphonso Mutolo had bene prisoner, and vnder whose assurance the practise had bene managed) and there was also slaine with a canon shot Paul de Parana Captaine to a companie of light horsemen of the Florentines. This hope being thus disappointed, and very small quantities of corne entring into Pisa, and that to the great danger of such as carried it, the Florentines withall not suffering that the vnprofitable mouthes should depart out of Pisa, vexing them with many aduersities, things necessarie for the life of man were bought at deare rates, yea many perished by famine, for that there could not enter a proportion to suffice the generall numbers. And yet these necessities were surmounted by the obstinacie of those Citizens which were principals in the gouernment, who being disposed rather to behold the extreme ruine of their countrey, then to yeeld to so horrible a necessitie, deferred from day to day to come to parley, entertaining as well as they could the Commons, sometimes with one hope, sometimes with another, but specially with this, that since there was no expectation of the coming of Cæsar into Italy, the Florentines would be constrained to retire from their walls. But part of the countreymen, with such as had bene at Plombin where they saw into their intentions, drew into conspiracie, and constrained them to introduce new consultations with the Florentines, which being followed by Alaman Saluiat Commander of that part of the armie which lay at Saint Peter d'Ingrado, after many disputings (the principals opposing many impediments) were at last resolued and concluded. The accord was made with conditions very fauourable for the Pisans, seeing that not onely all their faults both publicke and priuate were pardoned, but also many exemptions accorded, being also absolued from all restitution of moueable goods which they had taken from the Florentines at the time when they rebelled: so great was the desire of the Florentines to repossesse it, and so great their feare left from the Emperour (naming the Pisans in the league of Cambray, although the French King had not accepted the nomination) or from some other part, there happened no impediment vnlooked for. And albeit they were well assured that the Pisans would be constrained within foure dayes to giue place to hunger, yet they sought rather to assure the towne with hard conditions, then by obtaining it without conuention, to put any part of the certaintie in the power of fortune. This accord although it were begun to be negociated in the camp, was afterwards debated and concluded at Florence by the Embassadours of the Pisans: an action wherein the faith of the Florentines is worthy of memorie, who notwithstanding their iust hatreds prouoked by so many iniuries, ries, they were no leſſe conſtant to obſerue things promiſed, then eaſie and tractable to the agreement. The Emperour (no doubt) receiued a great diſpleaſure by the rendring of the Piſans, for that he was perſwaded, that either the demaine of that Citie might ſerue him to many occaſions, or elſe by according it to the Florentines, he ſhould draw from them a great quantitie of money, for want whereof he let ſlip and loſt many faire occaſions that were offered him without his paines and induſtrie. But whileſt he ſtood ſo negligent in oportunities offered, that neither at Vincenſa nor at Padua was almoſt any ſouldiers for him; and whileſt withall, his delayes abated the affection of the inhabitants of townes, himſelfe wandring with a very ſmall companie, ſometimes to one place, ſometimes to another, the Venetians let not ſlip the oportunitie that was offered them to recouer Padua, whereunto they were induced by many reaſons. For the retaining of Treuiſa made them know, how vnprofitable it was to them, with a counſell ſo raſh, to abandon ſo ſoone the dominion of the firme land; and the lingring preparations of the Emperour gaue them cauſe to hold him in leſſe feare dayly: and beſides, they were not a little moued, for that ſeeking to bring to Venice the reuenues of the lands which diuers particulars of the towne of Venice held in the countrey of Padua, thoſe of Padua made manifeſt reſiſtance. In ſo much that the diſdaine of certaine particulars ioyned to a publicke profite, and withall being allured by the knowledge they had that Padua was ill furniſhed of ſouldiers, and that by reaſon of the inſolencies which the Gentlemen of Padua vſed towards the populars, many remembring the eaſie and moderate gouernment of the Venetians, began eſtſoones to deſire their ancient yoke; they determined to make an attempt to recouer it, wherein they were aſſiſted with this ready occaſion, that thoſe of the plaine countrey of Padua ſtood yet at their deuotion. It was then decreed that Andrew Gritti, one of their Commanders, leauing the camp behind, wherein were foure hundred men at armes, more then two thouſand as well eſtradiots as light horſemen, and fiue thouſand footmen, ſhould go to Noualo vpon the frontiers of Padua, and taking in his way part of thoſe footbands, which, with many troupes of paiſants were ſent to the village of Mirana, he ſhould draw towards Padua to aſſaile the gate of Codalonga: and that at the ſame time, two thouſand of the popular ſouldiers, with three hundred footmen and certaine horſemen, the more to aſtoniſh them within, ſhould aſſault Portello ſtanding in the contrary part of the Citie: and the better to couer this enterpriſe, Chriſtopher Moro the other Commander, was likewiſe appointed to incampe afore Cinitella. This plot well layed, had alſo a happie iſſue, for the footmen arriuing at full day, found the gate of Codalonga halfe open, certaine paiſants a litle before being entred by chance with carts loden with hay: in ſo much, as commanding the gate without any difficultie, and expecting without any noiſe the coming of their other ſtrength, which was at hand, they not onely entred into the towne, but paſſed almoſt to the market place, afore the Citie, which containes a long circuite, and is not much peopled, was touched with any aduertiſement of the accident. The Knight de la Volpe marched firſt with his light horſemen, together with Zitolo de Perouſa and Lactantius de Bergama, with part of the footmen. But the alarme being come to the Citadel, Dreſſina Gouernour of Padua for Maximilian, prepared himſelfe to ſally out with three hundred Almaine footmen which he had there onely for his guard: the like did Brunalt de Serege with fiftie horſemen, who ſuſtaining the furie of the enemies, expected that the Gentlemen of Padua, fauourers of the Almaines, would take armes in their fauour: but that and all other hope was vaine, for that in the Citie fallen into this ſurpriſe and ſudden oppreſſion of tumult, was found no diſpoſition of reſiſtance, eſpecially many bands of the enemie being entred, and gouerning thoſe parts of the towne, wherein lay their chiefeſt protection: in ſo much as ſtanding thus abandoned of all hope, they were conſtrained, with the loſſe of many of their men, to retire with ſpeed into the Caſtle and Citadell, which being very weakly manned, they were conſtrained to yeeld to diſcretion within a few houres after. By this meanes the Venetians being eſtſoones made Lords of the whole, laboured to appeaſe the tumult, and ſaue the Citie, whereof the greateſt part, by the inſolencies of the others, were ranged to their deuotion, nothing receiuing ſpoile or harme, but certaine houſes of the Iewes, and ſome others of Padua, which had afore declared themſelues enemies to the Venetian name. This accident hapned the day of S. Marina, a day ſolemnly celebrated at Venice by publike decree, as a moſt happie day, and the beginning of the reſtoring of their Commonweale. The bruite of this victorie did much moue the whole countrey thereabouts; and there was great likelihood that Vincenſa had done the like, if Conſtantine of Macedo-

The Venetians determine to recouer Padua

nia,

nia, who by chance was neare at hand, had not entred with a very ſmall ſtrength. As ſoone as the Venetians had recouered Padua, they ſuddenly became maiſters of the whole countrey, the commons of townes and the country people fauoring them. They recouered alſo by this meane the towne and caſtle of Legnago, a place of great conueniencie to trouble the countreys of Verona, Padua and Vincenſa. Beſides this they aſſayed to take the tower Marquiſano, within eight miles of Padua, being a paſſage of ſingular oportunitie to enter into Poleſina de Rouigna, and to diſtreſſe the countrey of Mantua; but by the reſcues which the Cardinall of Eſte ſent, their enterpriſe was defeated.

The taking of Padua did nothing ſtay the Freneh king (as many thought) from returning beyond the Mounts, who as he was vpon his diſcamping, made in the towne of Biagraſſa new conuentions with the Popes Legat, by the which the Pope and the King bound each other to a mutuall protection, with libertie that either of them might contract with any other Prince, ſo farre forth as it was not preiudiciall to the preſent confederation. The King promiſed not to hold in his protection, nor to accept into the ſame hereafter, any ſubiect, homager, or dependant, either directly or indirectly of the Church, expreſly diſanulling all articles of protection vntill that day: a promiſe litle beſeeming the honour of ſo great a King; for that, a litle before, when the Duke of Ferrara came vnto him, although at the firſt he was angrie with him for that without his knowledge he had accepted the title of Gonfalonnier of the Church, yet afterwards being reconciled with him, he had taken him into his protection, for a conſideration of thirtie thouſand duckats. Beſides, it was agreed, that the Pope ſhould diſpoſe at his diſcretion the Biſhopricks that then were voide in all the lands of the Kings obedience; but for ſuch as ſhould fall voide within a certaine time, they ſhould be at the nomination of the King; for whoſe better ſatisfaction, the Pope ſent the Buls of Cardinalſhip to the Biſhop of Albie, by the ſaid Cardinall of Pauie, promiſing to indue him with the Hat as ſoone as he came to Rome. This contract being made, the King haſted immediatly out of Italy, carrying with him into France no ſmall glorie for ſo great a victorie, ſo ſuddenly gotten vpon the Venetians: and yet he carried home by this victorie, neither the more tranquillitie of mind, nor greater aſſurance for his affaires: a matter that often hapneth, that in things obtained, after they haue bene long deſired, men find neither that contentment, nor that pleaſure which they imagined before: yea men might diſcerne matter prepared for greater dangers and innouations, together with a more manifeſt incertaintie of his mind touching the deliberations he had to make by reaſon of thoſe accidents that were newly happned. For, if things ſucceeded well with the Emperour, his feare was farre greater of him then formerly it had bene of the Venetians. And if the greatneſſe of the Venetians began to be reſtored, he muſt be conſtrained to dwell in continuall ſuſpitions and perpetuall expences, to keepe the things he had taken from them: and not that onely, but alſo he muſt contribute to Maximilian both in men and money; for that in abandoning him, he was to feare leſt he would knit with the Venetians againſt him, and withall, leſt the Catholicke King would be of the faction, and haply the Pope. Beſides, meane aides and ſuccours would not ſuffice to entertaine him in amitie with Ceſar, but they muſt be ſuch, as by them he might obtaine the victorie againſt the Venetians. And on the other ſide, if he ſent him ſtrong and able ſuccours, beſides that it would draw with it intollerable expences and harmes, it would bring him into the ſame dangers by the greatneſſe of Ceſar. The King weighing theſe difficulties, ſtood in the beginning in doubt touching the mutation of Padua, to wit, whether he ſhould hold it agreeable or troubleſome: but after, conferring the ſuretie which the depriuation of the firme land from the Venetians might bring to him, with the perplexities and dangers which he feared to ſuffer by the greatneſſe of Ceſar, and with hope to obtaine of him for money, in regard of his neceſſities, the Citie of Verona, which he deſired much, as a place of ſingular oportunitie to ſuppreſſe the mouings on the ſide of Germanie: he iudged it at laſt more to his profit and ſuretie, to haue things remaine in that eſtate, that (there being great apparence of a long warre betweene Ceſar and the Venetians) both the parties made wearie by ſo continuall expences, might become more weake. And he was the more confirmed in this opinion when he had contracted with the Pope, with whom he hoped to haue a confederation well aſſured and reſolued: and yet he left vpon the limites of Verona, Monſieur de Paliſſa with ſeuen hundred Lances to be at Ceſars command, as well for the preſeruation of things gotten, as to obtaine that which the Venetians poſſeſſed as yet; and becauſe they were conueyed into Vincenſa by the commandement of Cæsar, the Citie of Verona was assured, which was in great danger and suspition for the small numbers of men of warre that were within it: and by that meane the Venetian armie which lay encamped before the Citadell, was retired. There happened also another good aduenture to the Venetians afore the Kings departure: for their horsemen which were within Legnaguo, making continuall incursions ouer the whole countrey, euen to the gates of Verona, and doing them great harmes, against whom, the garrison of Verona being but two hundred horsemen and seuen hundred footmen, and vnable to make resistance; the Bishop of Trent, whom Cæsar had appointed Gouernour ouer it, determined to plant his campe there, and to that end called thither the Marquis of Mantua, who expecting the preparations that were in hand, lay encamped with those bands which the French king had giuen him, in the Ile of Escalo, a great village in the countrey of Verona, neither enuironed with walls, nor made strong with other fortifications. But whilest he lay there without doubt of any thing, he serued as a notable example to all Captaines, how much it imports them at all times and in all places, to be vigilant, and so to manage their affaires, that they may haue confidence in their proper forces, without reposing in this vaine imagination, either that their enemies be farre off, or that they are but weake. For, as the Marquis had couenanted with certaine estradiots of the Venetian armie to come to him in that place, to take his pay and follow his ensigne, who from the beginning of the conference had communicated the deuice with their Captaines: and as the Captains, vpon this occasion had ordained to assaile him suddenly, Luke Maluezzo with two hundred light horsemen, and Zitolo de Perousa with eight hundred footmen, which were secretly come from Padua to Legnaguo, being ioyned to the bands which were within, and fifteene hundred men of the countrey, and sending before certaine horsemen, who cried Turco, Turco, (that was the surname of the Marquis) making as though they were those estradiots that were expected, they conueyed themselues in the peepe of day, without that there was any doubt made, to the Isle of Escalo the same morning that was appointed; where, without any resistance, they entred, and finding all the souldiers without guard, and such as followed the person of the Marquis sleeping, they put them to the spoile, and tooke prisoner amongst others, Monsieur de Boyssi Lieutenant to the Marquis, and nephew to the Cardinall of Amboise; and the Marquis vnderstanding the alarme, leaped naked out at a window, and hid himselfe in a corne field: but he was discouered to the enemy by a paisant of the same place, who (following the common affection of the countrey people) respected more the estate of the Venetians, then his particular profite, and made as though he would saue the Marquis for the great offers he made him, but did the contrary: so that the Marquis being led from thence to Padua, and after to Venice, was there put prisoner in the litle Tower of the publicke Pallace, to the wonderfull reioycing of euery one.

The Marquis of Mantua prisoner.

Cæsar till this day had giuen no impediment to the proceedings of the Venetians, for that he had not yet leuied a force sufficient to put himselfe in the field: and hauing bene busied many dayes in the mountaine of Vincensa, where the countreymen bearing deuotion to the Venetian name, and reposing much in the difficulties of the place, were drawne into manifest rebellion against him: and after descending into the plaines (Padua being already taken by the Venetians) he was encountred with multitudes of paisants in a passage of good situation & strength, where he was in no litle perill. But after he had put them to the chase, he came to Escalo vpon the frontier Vincentine, where the Venetian armie had recouered a great part of the countrey of Vincensa, and taken Serauallo, a passage of importance, where they executed many cruelties vpon the Almains; which was recompenced with the like crueltie by Maximilian vpon the Italian footmen and paisants, winning vpon them the passage not many dayes after. But as yet his forces being not very great, he occupied the time in small enterprises, sometimes besieging this borough, and sometime that passage, with very litle honour and reputation for the name Imperiall. And as alwayes his conceptions were farre greater then his forces or occasions, so he solicited at the same time with the confederates the vnion of all their forces, to take the Citie of Venice, making vse, ouer and aboue the preparations by land, of the sea armies of the French king, the King of Aragon, and the galleys of the Pope, being at that time conioyned and assembled into one Nauie. To which demand, notwithstanding no mention was made in the confederation of Cambray, the French had consented, if the conditions had bene such, as the benefite of the conquest had turned to a common profite: but it was a thing grieuous to the Pope, and which both then and at other times, when it was communed vpon more amply, was alwayes opposed by the King of

Aragon,

Aragon, (for that he ſuppoſed it would be profitable to the French) vſing this colour, that it was a thing both vniuſt and very diſhoneſt. But whileſt the countreys of Padua, Vincenſa, and Verona, ſuffered theſe torments by the armies of the Almaines and Italians, the countrey of Friul and thoſe places which were for the Venetians in Iſtria, were more miſerably afflicted: for that the Prince of Henault being entred by Cæſars direction into the countrey of Friul with ten thouſand men trained, after he had attempted in vaine to take Montfalcon, he carried by force the towne and caſtle of Cadora, with a pitifull execution and butcherie of thoſe that defended it. And on the other ſide, certaine light horſemen and footbands of the Venetians followed with many of the countrey men, tooke by force the towne of Valdiſera, and by accord, the towne of Bellona, where was no garriſon for the Almains. And beſides this, the Duke of Brunſwicke, whom the Emperour had likewiſe ſent thither, being repulſed at Vdnia the principall towne of Friul, was marched to Ciuital d'Auſtrich, a towne ſituate in a high place vpon the riuer of Natiſona, where Federike Contarin lay in garriſon with a very ſmall companie, repoſing much in the forces of the people, who had minds well reſolued to defend themſelues: to whoſe ſuccours, as Iohn Paul Gradinic Magiſtrate of Friul was coming with eight hundred horſemen and fiue hundred footmen, he was put to flight by certaine bands of the Almaines: and yet, notwithſtanding they had beaten Ciuital with their artillery, they could not carrie it, neither with the furious aſſault which they gaue, nor with the rumor they ſpread that they had defeated the ſuccours that came to reſcue them. In Iſtria, Chriſtopher Frangipan defeated neare the borough of Vermes, the Commiſſaries of the Venetians, accompanied with the bands and ſouldiers of the countrey: a ſucceſſe that put into his hands the new Caſtle and the towne of Raſpruch, to the great terrifying of the whole countrey, with the damages, ruines, and burnings that he made. For this cauſe the Venetians ſent thither Angeo Treuiſan Captaine of their ſea armie, with ſixteene galleys, who taking vpon his arriuall the towne of Fiumo, addreſt himſelfe to occupie the towne of Trieſto: but the ſucceſſe falling contrary, he turned his ſtrength to Raſpruch, and recouered it by force, and afterwards retired with his galleys to Venice, Friul and Iſtria remaining in a pitifull eſtate, for that ſometimes the Venetians commanding, and ſometimes the Almaines preuailing, thoſe townes which the one part had taken and ſacked, were eftſoones recouered and preyed vpon by the other. Which calamitie falling out often, the liues and goods of men ſtood continually as a prey, and the whole countrey was horribly waſted and ſpoiled. During theſe accidents of temporall armes, there was diſputation at Rome touching ſpirituall armes, ſixe Embaſſadours of Venice (ſince the reobtaining of Padua) being gone thither in habite and ſhew miſerable: for where afore they were wont to come in with great pompe and magnificence, and be receiued with a reuerence of the whole Court; now they were neither followed nor accompanied, but making their entrance by night, for ſuch was the pleaſure of the Pope, when they could not be admitted into his preſence, they went to the houſe of the Cardinall of Naples to negociate with him and the other Cardinals and Prelates appointed; the Embaſſadours of Cæſar, the French and Spaniſh, hindring as much as they could, that they ſhould not obtaine the abſolution of the Church paines: and of the contrary the Archbiſhop of Yorke, whom Henrie the eight (who by reaſon of the death of Henrie the ſeuenth his father, had a few moneths before ſucceeded to the Crowne of England) had ſent thither in their fauour, ſoliciting manifeſtly for them with all his endeuours.

But at this time an expectation of farre greater things occupied the minds of all men: for Cæſar leuying all the power he was able of himſelfe, with ſuch aides as he could gather of all his friends, prepared to beſiege Padua with a puiſſant armie: and on the other ſide, the Venetians iudging their vniuerſall ſafetie to conſiſt in the defence of that Citie, laboured to ſtrengthen it with all prouiſions neceſſarie for the defence thereof. They cauſed to enter, beſides the bands appointed for the guard of Treuiſa, their whole armie with all the forces they could gather from all parts; and conueyed thither infinite numbers of all ſorts of artilleries, with all kind of victuals, ſufficient to nouriſh them for many moneths, and furniſhed the towne with an innumerable multitude of paiſants and carpenters, by whoſe helpe beſides that they made many mounts, and ſluces of wood and iron, to the end they ſhould not be depriued of the water that was brought from Padua by the towne of Limini, they had made & continually did make about the walls of the Citie maruellous fortifications. And albeit the prouiſions and munitions were ſuch as greater could not be deſired, yet in an action of ſo great importance, the care and diligence of the Senate was incredible, omitting no oportunitie wherein occaſion was giuen to recouer their loſſes, and defend their libertie that remained. For the Senators ceaſſed not day and night to thinke vpon, to admoniſh, and to propound ſuch things as they iudged to be either neceſſary or profitable: whereof as they diſcourſed dayly in the Senate, Leonard Loredan their Duke, a man much reſpected for his age, and of no leſſe reputation for the dignitie of his place, whereunto he was called many yeares before, ſtanding vp, reaſoned in this manner:

The Oration of Leonard Loredan.

If, as the truth is, (right worthy Senators) not onely all the hope we haue to recouer our dominion, but alſo to preſerue our libertie, conſiſts in the defending of Padua; and if on the contrary, it be moſt certaine, that of the loſſe of Padua will deſcend the laſt deſolation of our country, we muſt neceſſarily grant, that the prouiſions and preparations which hitherunto we haue made, notwithſtanding they were very great, haue not yet bene ſufficient, either for that that appertaineth to the ſuretie of that Citie, or for that which reſpecteth the dignitie of our Commonweale. For in an action of ſuch danger and importance, it ſufficeth not to make ſuch preparations, as that there may be great hope of the defending of Padua, but they muſt be ſo mightie, that ſo farre forth as may be foreſeene by the wit of man, they may ſtand aſſured againſt all the accidents of fortune, who being mightie ouer all the things of the world, hath yet her greateſt power ouer the actions of warre. It is not a reſolution worthy the ancient renowne and glorie of the Venetian name, wholly to commit the publike ſafetie, our vniuerſall honour, and the proper liues of our wiues and children, to the vertue of ſtrangers and mercenarie ſouldiers; but we muſt willingly runne thither on heapes, to defend it with our breaſts and armes. For if we looke not now to the preſeruation of that Citie, there remaines no other place wherein we may trauell for our ſelues, ſhew our vertue, or expend our treaſure for our ſafetie. Seeing then the time to helpe and ſuccour our countrey is not yet paſt, we ought not to ſhunne any paines or trauell whatſoeuer, nor expect till we remaine a prey to thoſe that ſeeke to ſacke our goods, and moſt cruelly to drinke our bloud. The conſeruation of our countrey comprehends not onely the publike good, but together with the ſafetie of the Commonweale, is reſpected the ſecuritie of euery one in particular, hauing ſuch affinitie and coniunction together, that the one cannot conſiſt without the other. For the Commonweale falling into ſeruitude, who knowes not that the ſubſtance, the honours, and liues of priuate men, ſhall become a prey to the couetouſneſſe, to the voluptuouſneſſe, to the cruelties, and to the vile affections of the enemies? But though there were no other reſpect in the defending of a Commonweale, then the preſeruation of the countrey, is it not a thing worthy of noble Citizens full of glorie and reputation in this world, and moſt pleaſing to God? For it is the opinion, euen of the Gentiles, that in heauen is appointed a place particular for the perpetuall fruition and comfort of ſuch, as either ſuccoured, preſerued or augmented their countrey. And what countrey did euer better deſerue to be reſcued and ſupported by her children then this of ours, who for many ages hath retained the principalitie and firſt place of all the Cities of the world, and by whom the Citizens receiue infinite commodities, profites and honours? It is wonderfull, if you conſider the gifts which it hath receiued of nature, or the things which declare her perpetuall greatneſſe and happie fortune; or elſe thoſe effects which expreſſe her vertue, together with the nobilitie of the wits of her inhabitants. For her ſituation makes men amazed, being the onely Citie in the world ſeated amongſt the ſalt waters, hauing all her parts ſo conioyned, that at one time men may enioy the commodities of the water, and the pleaſure of the land. It is aſſured againſt the inuaſions of the land, for that it ſtandeth not on the firme land; and from thoſe of the ſea, for that it is not ſeated in the plaine and deepe ſea. I may alledge to the dignitie and reputation of this Citie, the wonderfull maieſtie of publike pallaces and priuate manſions, builded at incredible charges, and poliſhed with ſtrange marbles and ſtones of ſingularitie, brought hither from all parts of the world, together with a ſtately aſpect of excellent pourtraits, imageries, ſculptures, pillars, and other workmanſhips of worthy regard. But what Citie can be found at this day where there is a greater concourſe of all ſtrange nations, coming hither partly to dwell ſafely in this free and almoſt diuine countrey, and partly for the exerciſe of their trafficke and negociations, whereby our Commonweale is repleniſhed with all ſorts of merchandize and trafficke, whereby our citizens are continually enriched, and whereby our Commonweale doth draw ſuch a reuenue of that onely which is contained within the circuite of this Citie, that many abſolute Kings receiue not the like of their whole kingdomes? I omit the great affluence of men skifull in all arts and ſciences, and the qua-

litie of wits, and other vertues of men, from the which, ioyned to other conditions, is deſcended the glorie of thoſe actions which by this Commonweale and her deſcendants, haue bene made more great, then (ſince the imperie of the Romanes) by any other Principalitie or State in the world. I will not ſay alſo how admirable it is to ſee ſo great abundance of all things, in a Citie wherein nothing groweth, and yet repleniſhed with inhabitants. At the beginning our towne was ſtraited vpon theſe litle rocks, barren and naked of all things; and yet the vertue of our elders, ſtretching out firſt into the next ſeas and townes adioyning, and afterwards increaſing by happie ſucceſſe vpon the ſhores and prouinces further off, yea hauing runne euen to the vttermoſt limites of the Leuant, they got both by ſea and land ſo great an Empire, and held it ſo long, and augmented in ſuch ſort their power, that hauing bene of long time redoubted to all the other townes in Italy, it was neceſſary that the policies and forces of all the other Chriſtian Princes ſhould be banded and ioyned together to abate and depreſſe it. Matters aſſuredly hapned by the aide and fauour of the omnipotent God, for that the obſeruation of iuſtice indifferently adminiſtred in this Citie, is highly commended in all the world: for the onely bruite whereof many peoples and nations haue willingly ſubmitted themſelues to our gouernment. And further, is there any Citie, or any Empire, whereunto our countrey ſhall giue place? What Citie, what Empire, or what Principalitie excelleth our countrey, for matter of religion, and pietie towards God? Where may be ſeene more Monaſteries, more Temples full of ſo many rich and precious ornaments and things of admiration dedicated to the ſeruice of God? Where ſo many Hoſpitals and places of pitie, prepared with incredible charge for the perpetuall comfort of the afflicted, and continuall exerciſe of charitie? And certainly for all theſe things our countrey is by good right to be commended before any other; but farre more worthy are her praiſes for the glorie of this onely, that our countrey had at one time both her beginning and her libertie, and there was neuer ſeene any man borne or die in Venice, which was not borne and died a freeman; and likewiſe her libertie was neuer troubled: which felicitie is principally come to paſſe by the ciuill concord, which hath ſtood alwayes ſo rooted and confirmed in the hearts of men, that whenſoeuer they enter into our Senate, and into our counſels, they ſhake off all diſcords and priuate quarels. Of this ſ forme of gouernment is the cauſe, which being tempered and compounded of all the beſt ſorts of publike adminiſtration, and of ſuch a well conſenting harmonie agreeing in it ſelfe, that it hath remained for many ages vndefiled, without ciuill ſedition, without armes, and without effuſion of bloud amongſt the Citizens: a praiſe particular to our Commonweale, and whereof neither Rome, nor Carthage, nor Athens, nor Lacedæmon, nor any other of thoſe Commonweales which haue bene moſt renowned and beſt eſteemed of the Ancients can boaſt: yea there is found among vs ſuch a kind of gouernment and policie, that thoſe who haue made the greateſt profeſſion of ciuill wiſedome, could neuer imagine or deſcribe ſuch a one. Shall then the children and citizens of ſo glorious a countrey, which hath always bene the very bulwarke of the faith, and the beautie of the whole Chriſtian commonweale, be ſlow in the execution of their dutie? And ſhall there any be found who will refuſe to commit to danger the life of himſelfe and his children, for the protection thereof? which being comprehended in the defence of Padua, who is he that will refuſe to go thither in perſon to defend it? And albeit we be well aſſured that the forces that be there already, are ſufficient for the defence of it, appertaines it not to our honour, and concernes it not the glorie of the Venetian name, to make knowne to all the world, that we our ſelues did ſpeedily runne thither to defend and preſerue it? Such was the deſtinie of that Citie, that in a few dayes ſo great an eſtate ſhould fall out of our hands, wherein we haue not to complaine ſo much of the malice of fortune, (for that ſuch aduentures are common to all Commonweales and kingdomes) as that failing of our conſtancie, which till this day hath bene inuincible; and without all memory of the glorious examples of our elders, we haue with too ſudden deſpaire, giuen place to the mightie blowes of aduerſitie, and haue not expreſſed to our children that valour and vertue, which our fathers haue left well teſtified to vs. Now occaſion is offered vs to recouer that honour which is not yet loſt, if we will our ſelues ſhew the minds of men, but onely altered without any perill of abſolute ruine. For if we oppoſe againſt all fortune, and willingly offer our ſelues to dangers, we ſhall redeeme the infamies receiued; and when the world ſhall perceiue that our ancient generoſitie is not loſt, men will rather attribute the diſorders paſt to a certaine fatall tempeſt, which neither the counſels nor conſtancie of men could reſiſt, then impoſe vpon vs either blame or « dishonour. And therefore if it were reasonable that we went altogether to the rescue of Padua,

« and if for certaine dayes we might leaue this Citie without preiudice of her defence and other « publike affaires of importance, my selfe, without expecting your resolution, would be the first
« that should open the way, not seeing wherein I might better employ these last dayes of my old « age, then with my presence to participate in so glorious a victorie, or else not to remaine aliue
« after the ruine of my countrey, but to die together with others; a calamitie which my mind hath « horrour to expresse. But for that Venice, neither can, nor ought to be depriued of her publicke « counsels, wherein consisteth no lesse the defence of Padua in counselling, prouiding and ordai« ning, then in the force and armes of such as be there already: and the vnprofitable troupes of « old persons will stand in that Citie rather as a charge and burden, then as a succour and neces-« sarie aide: and seeing withall it is not conuenient, for any thing that may happen, to disfurnish « Venice of all her youth; my aduice is, respecting these reasons with the regard to accidents that « may occurre, that there be made a choise of two hundred Gentlemen of the principals of our « youth, and euery of them to go to Padua, with such proportion of friends and seruants as his a« bilitie will beare, and to continue there so long as shall be necessarie for the defence of that Ci-
« tie. My two sonnes with a great reuenue shall be the first to execute that, which I their father
« and your Prince haue proposed vnto them; whose liues and persons in so great a danger, I do « willingly offer to the succor of their country: so shal Padua be more assured; so shal the mercena-« rie souldiers that be there, seeing our youth cheerfully assisting all actions that concerne that ser-
« uice, reioyce exceedingly, and haue the more courage, being well assured that seeing our sons « and kinsmen are ioyned with them, they shall haue no want of victuals and munitions, nor of « any other aide or supply. The youth and the rest that go not, shall be so much the more encou« raged by this example, to vndergo, when need shall so require, all quarrels and dangers. You « Senators, (whose words and doings serue as an example and mirrour to the whole Citie) who« soeuer among you haue sufficient abilitie, striue that your sonnes may be enrolled in the num« ber of those that shall communicate in so great a glorie: for hereby will ensue not onely an assu« red and certaine defence of Padua, but also we shall procure to our selues with all nations, this « reputation, namely, that we our selues are they, who with the danger of our owne liues, do de« fend the libertie and safetie of the most worthy and flourishing countrey that is in the world.

The Gentlemē of Venice go to the succours of Padua.

This counsell of the Prince was heard with great attention and approbation, and with all speed put in execution. And the flower of the noble yong Gentlemen of Venice, drew to them as many of their friends and followers fit for armes, as they could, and went to Padua, being accompanied to their embarquing with all the other Gentlemen, and with an infinite multitude of people, who celebrated with many praises, and with vowes full of pietie and affection, so great a readinesse to succour their countrey. They were receiued at Padua with no lesse ioy and applause of all men, the Captaines and souldiers extolling the valour of those yong Gentlemen, who not trained nor experienced in the trauels and dangers of warre, preferred the loue of their countrey afore their proper life: so that encouraging one another, they expected very ioyfully the coming of Cesar; who labouring to assemble the bands of souldiers that came to him from many places, was by this time come to the bridge of Brento, three miles from Padua, and hauing taken Limini by force, and cut off the course of the water, he stayed for the artillerie which was coming out of Germanie, which was no lesse terrible for the quantitie then for the qualitie; of which when part was brought to Vincensa, and Philip Rosse and Federike Gonsague de Bossolo with two hundred light horsemen went forth to guard it, they were encountred by fiue hundred light horsemen that issued out of Padua, being led by the paisants, who in all that warre did much seruice for the Venetians; and ouerthrowne fiue miles from Vincensa, where Philip remained prisoner, and Federike by the fauour of the night escaped in his shirt. From the bridge Brenta, Maximilian caused his companies to march about twelue miles, drawing towards Polesina de Rouigna, the better to open to himselfe the commoditie of victuals; and taking the borough of Este by assault, and putting it to sacke, he went to encampe at Monselica, where the towne standing in the plaine being abandoned, the second day he tooke the Castle standing on the top of a high rocke. Afterwards he tooke by composition Montagnana, from whence returning towards Padua, he incamped at the bridge of Bassanello neare Padua, and assayed in vaine to turne the riuer of Brenta which from thence hath his course to Padua: at which place all the artilleries and munitions which he expected being arriued, and all the regiments of men of warre which lay dis-

perſed in diuers places being come together, he approched the towne with all his armie: and hauing beſtowed foure thouſand footmen in the ſuburbes which are called S. Croſſe, his opinion was to aſſaile it on that ſide. But afterwards being aduertiſed that it was the ſtrongeſt part of the towne both by ſituation and by walls, and that it was the beſt fortified, and alſo for that he there receiued great harmes by the artilleries of Padua, he determined to remoue and tranſport his armie to the gate Portello, bearing his aſpect to Venice; becauſe he was informed that the towne was moſt weake in that place, and withall to giue impediment to the ſuccours which were to come from Venice to Padua either by land or by water. But for that he could not go thither for the diſcommoditie of certaine marriſhes and waters that ouerflowed the countrey, but by fetching a great circuite, he came to the bridge of Bouolento, which is ſeuen miles from Padua, where be paſtures and feeding grounds vpon the banke of Baguillon towards the ſea, betweene Padua and Venice. Into this place, being enuironed with waters, and in the moſt ſure part of the countrey of Padua, were withdrawne three thouſand paiſants with great heards of cattell, who being forced by the footbands of the Spaniſh and Italians that were in the vauward, were almoſt all taken or ſlaine, the victors for the two dayes following doing nothing elſe but ouer-run the whole countrey, euen to the ſea, driuing away infinite heards of cattell feeding in that quarter. There were alſo taken vpon Brenta diuers barks, which laden with victuals were going vp to Padua. And at laſt, the fifteenth day of September, after he had conſumed much time vnprofitably, and giuen leiſure to the enemie both to fortifie and refurniſh the towne with victuals, he approched the walls of Padua on that ſide towards the gate Portello. There hath not bin ſeen in Italy in this age, nor haply a long time before, a ſiege of more great expectation, nor wherein the minds of men were more buſily occupied, then this, as well for the nobilitie of the Citie, as for the importance that was in the loſing or keeping of the ſame. For Padua a moſt noble and ancient Citie, and renowmed for the Vniuerſitie of ſtudies, and by which do paſſe the riuers of Brenta and Baguillon; it is compaſſed with three orders of wals, and which peraduenture hath as great a circuite of ground, as any of the greateſt Cities of Italy; is ſeated in a countrey fertill, and where the aire is temperate and wholeſome: and although the Venetians won it out of the poſſeſſion of the family of Carrato more then two hundred yeares ſince, yet it retaines many great and ſtately buildings, with many memorable markes of antiquitie, well expreſſing her ancient greatneſſe and beautie. And of the conquering or defending of ſo great a Citie, depended, not onely the confirmation or diminution of the Almaine imperie in Italy, but alſo the very eſtate of the Citie of Venice. For Padua being defended, the Commonweale of Venice abounding in wealth, and being at vnitie in her ſelfe, with ſtore of prompt wits, and ſubiect to no ſuch variations as the affaires of Princes are, may eaſily hope to recouer in ſmall time a part of her iuriſdiction: and ſo much the more, by how much the moſt part of thoſe ſubiects which had thirſted after mutations, hauing not found effects anſwerable to their conceptions, and knowing by compariſon what difference there was betweene the moderate gouernment of the Venetians, and that of the Almaines, farre different from the maners and cuſtomes of the Italians, and greatly diſordered by the confuſions and damages of the warre, they began to be better affected to their ancient gouernment: but on the contrary, if Padua were loſt, the Venetians ſhould loſe all hope to be able to reſtore the glorie of their Commonweale, yea there was great danger that the very Citie of Venice diſpoiled of ſo great an eſtate, & depriued of great riches, & many treaſures, both by the diminution of publike reuenues, and by the loſſe of ſo much goods poſſeſſed by priuate perſons in the firme land, would not be able to maintaine defence againſt the armies of the Princes confederate, or at leaſt would in time become a prey as well to the Turkes (to whom they are neighbours in many places, and with whom they haue had alwayes either warre, or peace vnfaithfull and ill aſſured) as to the Chriſtian Princes. But all men were in no leſſe doubt, the mightie preparations that were made on all ſides keeping wonderfully in ſuſpence the common iudgements, which were very vncertaine on whether part the better fortune would fall, either to the aſſailants or to the defendants. For in the armie of Caſar, beſides the ſeuen hundred French Lances, which Monſieur la Paliſe commanded, there were two hundred men at armes which the Pope had ſent to his aide; two hundred more ſent by the Duke of Ferrara, vnder the charge of the Cardinall of Eſte, notwithſtanding the quarrels that were betweene them were not yet reconciled; and ſixe hundred Italian Lances vnder ſundry Captaines which he had taken into his pay. He was no leſſe ſtrong in footmen then in horſemen: for he had eighteene thouſand Almaine footmen, ſixe thouſand Spaniſh, ſixe thouſand aduenturers of diuers nations, and two thouſand Italians, leuied and payed by the Cardinall of Eſte vnder the ſame title. There followed him a wonderfull proportion of all ſorts of artilleries, with great quantities of munitions, whereof the French King had ſent him part. And albeit for the moſt part his owne ordinarie bands were not payed, yet, what with the conſideration of the greatneſſe and authoritie of ſuch a Leader, and the hope to ſpoile and ſacke Padua, and to haue at their deuotion all that the Venetians poſſeſſed as yet, they abandoned not their ſeruice for that, but flocked to him dayly in greater numbers, chiefly for that all men knew, that he that of his owne nature was moſt liberall and full of humanitie to his ſouldiers, would not faile of their paiment by couetouſneſſe or will, but by diſabilitie or want. This was the ſtrength of Cæſars armie, not wholly compounded of his owne forces, but alſo of ſtrangers and mercenaries. But as touching the defence of Padua, the armie which the Venetians had in that Citie, was no leſſe mightie: for they had there ſixe hundred men at armes, fifteene hundred light horſemen, fifteene hundred eſtradiots, commanded by theſe notable Captaines, the Count Petillane Generall of the whole, Bernardino de Montono, Anthonie de Pio, Luke Maluzzo, Iohn Greeke, with other inferiour leaders. There were beſides the horſemen, twelue thouſand footmen of the beſt experienced and trained in all Italy, vnder the charge of Denis de Naldo, Zitoſe de Perouſa, Lactantius de Bergamo, Saccoio de Spoleto, with many other officers: ten thouſand footmen, as well Slauonians, Greekes, as Albanois, whom they had drawne from their galleys, of whom albeit many were not much profitable to the ſeruice, yet ſome of them were well trained and able to do neceſſary office. Beſides theſe, they had the youth of Venice and their followers, who albeit they were much reſpected for their nobilitie and pietie to their countrey, yet for that they offered themſelues readily to all dangers, and for the example which they gaue to others, they were of great importance. There was alſo great ſtore of all prouiſions neceſſarie, great quantities of artilleries, wonderfull plentie of all ſorts of victuals, the people of the plaine countreys being no leſſe carefull to bring in their prouiſions for their common ſuretie, then the magiſtrates and officers of Venice to giue order for their continuall refurniſhing, and a multitude almoſt innumerable of paiſants, who being leuied at a certaine price, laboured inceſſantly: in ſo much as that Citie being very ſtrong for the valour and numbers of the defendants, was wonderfully fortified with rampiers in the whole circuite of the walls: for they had almoſt filled vp all the waterditch which runneth along the walls, and at euery gate of the towne and other places conuenient, builded many forts and cloſe baſtillions without, but ſo as they were annexed to the walls, and had entries and conueyances into the towne, and being wel repleniſhed with artilleries, they beat ſuch as entred into the trench. And yet to the end § taking of thoſe baſtillions ſhould bring no danger to the town, they had made vnder each of them a caue filled with barrels of gun-powder, to blow thē vp into the aire when they could be no longer defended. And not altogether repoſing in the greatneſſe & goodnes of the old wall, notwithſtanding they had viewed it diligently, and repaired it where it was needfull, caſting downe the battlements; they made round about the Citie within, a Paliſſado or fortification of ſtakes, trees, and other peeces of wood, as farre diſtant from the wall as it was in thickneſſe, and with a wonderfull diligence filled vp to the top of the wall with good earth and well rammed, all the voide place that was betweene. This fortification no leſſe wonderfull in effect, then for labour and trauell ineſtimable, wherein were employed an infinite number of men, did not yet ſatisfie the expectation of thoſe to whom the defence of that Citie was committed, but the wall being in this ſort fortified and redoubled, they caſt a trench of ſixteene fadome in breadth, and as many in depth, which drawing narrower in the bottome, and ſtanding thicke with murdering houſes and litle towers full of ſhot, ſeemed impoſſible to be forced: and theſe fortifications were made with hollow vaults and caues, according to the example of the baſtillions, hauing conueyances to be ouerthrowne by fire when they would. And yet to be further prepared for all occaſions, they raiſed behind the trench a rampier of the ſame or greater largeneſſe, which ſtretched out as farre as the circuite of the towne, except in certaine corners and places, wherein they knew it was impoſſible to plant artillerie: and before the rampier they caſt a parapet of ſeuen fadome, which was a defence to thoſe that fought vpon the rampier, that they could not be ſtricken with the artilleries of the enemie. And to the end the courage of the ſouldiers and men of the towne might eaſily anſwer thoſe prouiſions and fortifications, when the Count Petillane had aſſembled the whole armie in the place of S. Anthonie,

and had encouraged them with ſpeeches of great grauitie and valour, to conſider vpon what termes ſtood their common ſafetie and honour, he bound himſelfe, and cauſed to be bound by ſolemne oath all the Captaines, all the armie, and thoſe of the towne, to employ themſelues faithfully in the defence of the Citie, euen to death.

Then the armie of Ceſar being drawne neare the walls of Padua, with ſo great a ſtrength, and againſt ſo mightie a preparation, he ſtretched out his campe from the gate Portello vnto the gate of All Saints which leades to Treuiſa, and from thence enlarged it to the gate of Codalonga which goeth to the Citadell, ſo as it contained three miles in length. Maximilian himſelfe was lodged in the Monaſterie of S. Helen, diſtant a quarter of a mile from the Citie walls, being as it were in the midſt of the Almaine footmen: and after he had giuen to euery one his charge, according to the diuerſitie of nations and places of their encamping, he began to plant his artilleries for the batterie, which could not be accompliſhed (albeit in his perſon being inuincible in mind, and of a bodie hardned with paine and trauels, he performed a wonderfull diligence, running through all places day and night, and being preſent in all actions) but with longneſſe of time and great difficultie, as well for the great quantitie and intollerable greatneſſe of ſome of them, as alſo for that the whole campe, and ſpecially thoſe places where they ſought to plant them, were continually beaten and diſtreſſed with the artilleries of the towne. At laſt, the perpetuall induſtrie of Maximilian ioyned to the valour of his ſouldiers, made way to plant his artilleries, and the ſame day the French and the footmen of the Almaines gaue an aſſault to the tower of the gate on that ſide where Monſieur la Paliſſa had the charge, but more to ſound and proue their countenance, then with intention to fight in good earneſt: and therefore finding the reſiſtance valiant and well furniſhed, they retired eftſoones to their tents. The day following, the artilleries ſhot furiouſly without ceaſſing, the greateſt part of them by their incredible hugeneſſe and vnmeaſurable quantitie of powder that was vſed, piercing through the rampiers, beat downe the houſes that were neare the walls: and now in many places a great ſpace of the wall was caſt downe, and the baſtillion built at the gate of All Saints was beaten downe to the ground; but for al that the defendants, afflicting the camp with continual volleys of ſhot, ſhewed no ſigne of feare: and the eſtradiots that in great valour were lodged in the ſuburbes, refuſing to retire into the towne, and the light horſemen making continuall incurſions in all places, skirmiſhed with their enemies ſometimes before, and ſometimes behind, driuing them euen to their tents, ſometimes they diſtreſſed ſuch as were guards to the forragers and victuallers, and ſometimes ouerrunning and ſpoiling the whole countrey, they troubled all the wayes, except that which goeth from Padua to the mount of Aban: and yet there was in the campe a wonderfull abundance of victuals, euery houſe and place being plentifully furniſhed; for that neither the feare of the paiſants, nor the carefull diligence of the Venetians, nor the infinite harmes of the ſouldiers on both ſides, could waſte or draine vp the great plentie of that moſt fruitfull and fertill countrey. At the ſame time alſo Luke Maluezzo iſſued out of Padua with many horſemen for the conuoy of fortie thouſand duckats which were ſent thither from Venice: and albeit in his returne the enemie charged him vpon the taile, yet he brought in the treaſure in ſafetie, without any other loſſe then of ſome of his men at armes. By the ninth day the artillerie had executed ſo well, that it ſeemed there was no further neceſſitie to ſhoote, and therefore the day following, the whole armie prepared in order of battell to approch the wals; but perceiuing that the ſame night they within the towne had made the water of the ditch to ſwell and riſe, which afore was abated, and Ceſar holding it not neceſſarie to commit his ſouldiers to a manifeſt danger, euery one returned to his lodging. The next day (the water eftſoones abated) they gaue an aſſault (but with ſlender ſucceſſe) to the baſtillion which was made vpon the point of the gate of Codalonga, and therefore the Emperour purpoſing to do what he could to force it, cauſed to be turned thither the artilleries that were planted in the quarter of the French, lying betweene the gates of All Saints and Codalonga: wherewith hauing ruined ſome part, two dayes after he commanded the Almain and Spaniſh footmen, accompanied with certaine men at armes on foote to giue the aſſault, who fighting valiantly aſcended the baſtillion, and ſet vp there two enſignes. But the fortreſſe of the ditch was ſuch, and no leſſe the vertue of the defendants, (amongſt whom Zitolo of Perouſa fighting brauely and with great honor, was ſore hurt) and ſo plentifull the inſtruments of defence, not onely of artilleries, but alſo of ſtones and wildfires, that they were conſtrained to deſcend by heapes, many being wounded and many ſlaine: in ſo much as the armie that ſtood

in readineſſe to giue the aſſault to the wall, as ſoone as the baſtillion ſhould be taken (as they thought) retired, and diſarmed, without making any other attempt. Maximilian by this experience loſt all hope of the victorie; and therefore determining to go his way, after he had beſtowed his artilleries in ſure places, he retired with all his armie to the towne of Limini which is towards Treuiſa, the ſeuenteenth day after he was encamped before Padua: and afterwards with many baites and reſting places he went to Vincenſa, from whence when he had taken of that people the oath of fidelitie, and diſmiſſed almoſt all his armie, he tooke his way towards Verona, being not a litle diſcontent that his deliberations had ſucceeded no better, but much more for that they were maruellouſly taxed, both in his armie and throughout all Italy: and no leſſe the execution of the things determined. For no man doubted, that the cauſe why he tooke not Treuiſa, and that he loſt Padua, was any other then his owne fault; and alſo that his too late arriuing afore Padua, made the action more hard, for that thereby the Venetians had time to make prouiſion of ſouldiers, to repleniſh Padua with victuals, and to make ſuch admirable preparations and fortifications. And he himſelfe denied not, but that had bene the cauſe that the Citie was defended; but putting off the faults of his varietie and diſorders, and caſting them vpon others, he complained of the Pope and the French king, for that the one had ſuffered the Embaſſadours of Venice to go to Rome, and the other had bene too ſlow in ſending ſuccours; the ſame giuing occaſion to the world to beleeue that they were eſtranged from him, and had likewiſe encouraged the countrymen of the mountaines of Vincenſa to draw into rebellion; for the ſubduing of whom, after he had conſumed many dayes, he likewiſe found (for the ſame cauſe) the like difficulties in the plaine countrey: Alſo that to open way, and aſſure himſelfe of victuals, and to free himſelfe from many inconueniences, he was conſtrained to take all the townes of the countrey: That herein the ſlow marching of the French had not onely much hurt him, but if they had come in due time, the reuolt of Padua had not happened: And that as well for this, as for that the Kings of France and Aragon had diſmiſſed their armie at ſea, the Venetians being freed from all other feares, had the better oportunitie to furniſh and fortifie Padua. And he complained further, that theſe difficulties were very plauſible to the King of Aragon, as meanes the more eaſily to induce him to conſent that the adminiſtration and gouernment of the kingdome of Caſtile ſhould remaine to him. But theſe complaints did nothing better his conditions, nor recouer his authoritie loſt, not knowing how to vſe ſo faire occaſions: for the French King was well content that ſuch an opinion was generally conceiued of him, and the Pope cared not much, who of his owne inclination being ſuſpitions and diſtruſtfull, and conſidering that the Emperour alwayes wanted money, and was importunate in demanding of it, was vnwilling that his name ſhould increaſe in Italy. At Verona he receiued the oath of fidelitie, and in that Citie the Florentine Embaſſadours, whereof Peter Guicciardin my father was one, couenanted with him in the name of that Commonweale (induced thereunto, beſides other reaſons, by the perſwaſions of the French King) to pay him within a ſhort time fortie thouſand duckats: for which promiſe they obtained of him moſt ample priuiledges, for the confirmation as well of the libertie of Florence, as of the dominion and iuriſdiction of the townes and eſtates which they held, together with acquittance and diſcharge of all duties and demands for the time paſt. Thus Ceſar being reſolued to returne into Germanie, to giue order (as he ſaid) for the warres he intended to make in the Spring of the yeare, ſent for Monſieur de Chaumont to come and commune with him about the preſent affaires: and when he was come vnto him at the village of Ars in the territorie of Verona, he layed afore him what danger there was, that the Venetians would come and recouer Ciuitella and Baſſana, places of great importance, which they prepared to aſſaile, being made proud by the defence of Padua: alſo that there was danger leſt they would do the like afterwards to Monſelica, Montagnana and Eſte: That it was neceſſarie, not onely to looke to the keeping of theſe places, but alſo to be carefull of the meanes to recouer Legnaguo: and that he himſelfe being ſufficiently able to leuie prouiſions neceſſarie for ſuch effects, it was needfull that the King ſhould aide him, whoſe places would fall into manifeſt danger, if the peeces which he held were not ſupported. To theſe demands, Monſieur de Chaumont, in whom was no power to make any certaine reſolution, gaue anſwer, that he would aduertiſe the King, and that he hoped the anſwer would be conformable to his deſire. After this conference, Ceſar went to Chiuſa, leauing the Marquis of Brandenbourg for the guard of Verona; and a litle after, Monſieur de Paliſſa remaining with fiue hundred Lances vpon the countrey of Verona, alledging the difficulties of lodging lodging and many other incommodities, after he had gotten leaue of him, almoſt by importunitie, he retired to the frontier of the Duchie of Millan: for that the Kings intention was, that if his men of warre ſhould remaine in garriſon and do nothing, they ſhould not abide vpon his eſtate, but ſhould returne to the ſeruice of Maximilian, to expect ſuch enterpriſes as he would embrace, but chiefly that of Legnagno, the which though it was much deſired and ſolicited by him, yet was it ſo much deferred by his accuſtomed difficulties, that the raines fell ſo faſt by the propertie of the ſeaſon, that it was impoſſible to encamp in that country, which for the lowneſſe thereof is much ſubiect to waters: and therefore the Emperour being brought into theſe ſtraits, deſired a truce with the Venetians for certaine moneths. But they taking courage by theſe diſorders, and ſeeing how ſlowly the Confederates miniſtred to his aide, iudged it not for their profite to conſent to any ſurceaſſing of armes.

At laſt the Emperour returned to Trent, leauing thoſe places that he held in great danger, and all Italy in great doubt: for there was raiſed a new contention betweene the Pope and the French King, the foundation whereof although it ſeemed to proceed from light occaſions, yet it was feared leſt it aroſe of ſome ſecret practiſes and cauſes of greater importance then ſuch as were made knowne; which was this: A Biſhopricke being voide in Prouence by the death of the incumbent, dying in the Court of Rome, the Pope had diſpoſed of it againſt the liking of the French King, who pretended that ſuch an action was contrary to the capitulation which the Cardinall of Pauie had made betweene them; wherein although it were not expreſſed in words, that there ſhould be equall obſeruation touching the Biſhopricks that ſhould fall voide in the Court of Rome, as in thoſe that ſhould fall vacant in other places, yet that the Cardinall had promiſed him ſo by word of mouth: which the Cardinall denying to be true, more perhaps for feare then for any other occaſion, the Pope affirmed, that he tooke no knowledge of any thing that was promiſed in ſecret, but that in the ratification he had regard to that that appeared in the writing, wherein he had ſet downe diſtinctly all the contents of the capitulation, article by article, and the caſe concerning the Biſhops dying in the Court of Rome being not therein comprehended, he was no further bound. And therefore the ſame diſcontentment increaſing, the King (reiecting, contrary to his cuſtome, the counſell of the Cardinall of Amboiſe, who had alwayes aduiſed him to be at accord with the Pope) made ſequeſtration of the fruites of all thoſe benefices which the Churchmen reſident in the Court of Rome held in the Duchie of Millan: and on the other ſide, the Pope refuſed to giue the Cardinals Hat to the Biſhop of Albie, who, according to the promiſe made to the King, was gone to Rome to receiue it. And although the Pope, ouercome by the requeſts of many, diſpoſed in the end of the Biſhopricke of Prouence according to the Kings mind, and made a new agreement with him touching the proceeding in benefices that hereafter ſhould fall in the Court of Rome; and in that regard the ſequeſtrations to ceaſſe on the one ſide, and on the other part the Hat to be transferred to the Biſhop of Albie: yet theſe things ſuffiſed not to moderate the mind of the Pope, who was not a litle kindled for many reaſons, but ſpecially for that hauing from the beginning of his Popedome very vnwillingly transferred the Legation of the Realme of France to the Cardinall of Amboiſe, as hurtfull to the Court of Rome, and preiudiciall to his authoritie; it was moſt grieuous vnto him (to auoide the diſpleaſure of the French King) to continue it to him: and therefore perſwading himſelfe that the ſame Cardinall aſpired with all his thoughts and meanes to the Popedome, he ſtood in feare and doubt of euery progreſſe and mouing of the French. Theſe were the apparent cauſes of his diſcontentment; but by that which was diſcerned afterwards, he propoſed to him ſelfe greater ends, deſiring vehemently, either for greedineſſe of glorie, or for ſome ſecret hatred againſt the French King, or at leaſt longing for the libertie of the Genoways, that the King might loſe all that he poſſeſſed in Italy: and he ceaſſed not to complaine openly of him and the Cardinall of Amboiſe; but ſo, that it ſeemed his diſcontentment proceeded chiefly of feare. And yet, as he was of nature obſtinate and inuincible, and for the moſt part accompanied the diſpoſition of his mind with outward demonſtrations: ſo though he aſpired in his thoughts to an end of ſo great conſequence and hard to obtaine, truſting onely to himſelfe, and in the reuerence and authoritie which he knew Chriſtian Princes bare to the Papall ſeate, he woud not enter into alliance nor depend vpon any; but ſhewing both by words and deeds how litle account he made of all, he forbare to ioyne with Maximilian, and refuſed to enter into ſecret intelligence with the King Catholike, but eſtranging himſelfe from all the reſt, he inclined onely to the part of the

the Venetians, reſoluing dayly more and more to abſolue them; iudging it a thing very conuenient for the common ſafetie of Italy, and for his particular ſuretie and greatneſſe, not to ſuffer them to periſh. Againſt this the Embaſſadours of Maximilian and the French King, made great reſiſtance, with whom was publikely concurrant in the ſame buſineſſe the Embaſſadour of the King of Aragon, notwithſtanding ſecretly he ſolicited the Pope to the contrary, fearing the greatneſſe of the French King in regard of the kingdome of Naples, and repoſing litle in the diſpoſition of Cæſar, for the ſlender ſtabilitie that was in him. Theſe Embaſſadours alledged, that it was not reaſonable, that the Pope ſhould do ſo great a benefite for thoſe whom he was bound to purſue with armes; ſeeing that by the confederation of Cambray euery Confederate was bound reciprocally to aid one another till there was abſolute recouery of all thoſe places which were named for euery one in particular: Wherefore then ſeeing Cæſar had not yet conquered Treuiſa, none of them was freed of that bond: beſides that, he might iuſtly refuſe abſolution to the Venetians, for that they had not reſtored to the Church the townes of Romagna, either willingly, or in the time ſet downe in the monition: nay, they had not as yet fully obeyed, for that they were admoniſhed, beſides the townes, to reſtore the fruites, which they haue not accompliſhed. But hereunto the Pope anſwered, that ſince they were returned to penance, and had ſought for abſolution with great humilitie, it was not the office of Chriſts Vicar to perſecute them any further with ſpirituall weapons to the preiudice of ſo many thouſand ſoules, ſpecially hauing obtained of them the Townes, and by that meanes the occaſion ceaſſing for which they had bene ſubiect to the cenſures of the Church: That touching the reſtitution of the fruites, it was but a matter accidentall, and vrged more to aggrauate their diſobedience, then for any other reaſon; and that it was not meete that that ſhould ſtand againſt them as a matter of importance: That it was an action of another nature to purſue them with temporall armes, wherein (ſeeing he had determined in the league of Cambray to perſeuere) he offered himſelfe readie to be concurrant with the others; although any of the Confederates might iuſtly leaue off, for that if Cæſar had not Treuiſa, it was through his owne fault, in refuſing the firſt offers which the Venetians made to him by their Embaſſador Anthonie Iuſtiniã, to leaue him all that they poſſeſſed in the firme land; and alſo the other offer, which they made him many times ſince, to giue him ſufficient recompence in exchange for Treuiſa. And thus not being retained by any contradiction of the Embaſſadours, he was ſlow to this action onely by the haughtineſſe of his mind, whereby it came to paſſe, that albeit he eſteemed the abſolution of the Venetians to be profitable vnto him, and to the plots he had layed, yet he had determined not to giue it them, but with great reſpect to his authoritie, and in ſuch ſort, as whatſoeuer was dependant of the Church, might be wholly freed from their oppreſſions: which was the cauſe that the Venetians being vnwilling to yeeld to two conditions which he propoſed vnto them among many others, he deferred to abſolue them. One of the conditions was, that they ſhould leaue the nauigation of the Adriatique ſea free to the ſubiects of the Church, which they reſtrained to all thoſe that would not pay them a certaine tribute for the merchandize they brought: the other, that they ſhould continue no longer at Ferrara (a Citie depending of the Church) the office of Vicedomino. The Venetians alledged, that they of Ferrara had conſented to it, Pope Clement the ſixt giuing no impediment, who at that time remained with his Court in the Citie of Auignon: and that Pope Alexander the fourth had giuen them the iuriſdiction and guard of the Gulfe with very large priuiledges; being hereunto moued, for that with their armes, by their vertue, and with their expences they had defended it againſt the Saracens and pirats, and made that nauigation ſafe for the Chriſtians. To theſe reaſons it was anſwered on ꝧ Popes behalfe, that they of Ferrara could not in preiudice of the Eccleſiaſtike iuriſdiction, conſent, that any other ſhould hold office or exerciſe dominiõ in Ferrara: & that the people of Ferrara had not willingly conſented, but forced by a long & grieuous war, and hauing in vaine craued aid of the Pope, whoſe cenſures the Venetians contemned, were conſtrained to accept peace at the diſcretion of thoſe, who could do more againſt them by arms then by reaſon. And wheras they ſay it was granted to thẽ by Pope Alexander, there appeareth nothing either in hiſtories or cõtracts, neither is there any other thing to cauſe vs to beleeue it, ſaue only the teſtimonie of the Venetians, which in their owne cauſe, of ſo great conſequence, is to be ſuſpected: & though there ſhould ſome ſuch thing appeare, yet it is more likely, that he, whom they ſaid had accorded to ſuch things in Venice, had done it by threatnings or for feare, then that a Pope of Rome, to whom afore all others appertained the defence of iuſtice, and the

recourſe of the oppreſſed, would haue conſented to a thing ſo imperious and domageable to all the world.

In this eſtate of affaires, diuerſitie of intentions of Princes, and ſmall power and reputation of the Emperour, the Venetians ſent their armie to Vincenſa vnder the leading of Andrew Gritti, knowing that the people there deſired to returne vnder their obedience; and making their approch in the euening, after they had battered the ſuburbes of Portello with the artilleries, they tooke it. Touching the Citie, although there were very few ſouldiers in it, yet the Venetians had no great aſſurance to carrie it: but the townesmen, ſtirred vp by Fracaſſe (as the bruite went) after they had ſent Embaſſadours to them about midnight, let them in, and the Prince of Henault and Fracaſſe retired into the Caſtle. And it was aſſuredly beleeued, that if the Venetian armie, hauing obtained Vincenſa, had without delay approched Verona, that towne had done the like: but the Captaines thought it not fit to depart out of the towne vntill the Caſtle were taken, which they had the fourth day, for that the Prince of Henault and Fracaſſe finding themſelues too weake, left it abandoned. In the meane time 5 companies of Ceſar entred Verona, and three hundred Lances of the French King, vnder the charge of Monſieur d'Aubigny: in ſo much as containing a ſtrength of fiue hundred Lances and fiue thouſand footmen Spaniſh & Almains, it was now no more eaſie to take it. Not long after the Venetian armie approched Verona, being deuided into two parts, in either of which were three hundred men at armes, fiue hundred light horſmen, and three thouſand footmen. They hoped, that as ſoone as they were approched, there would be ſome commotion in the Citie, but becauſe they preſented not themſelues afore the walls all at one time, thoſe within the towne going to afront the former part which came beyond the riuer of Adice, and was already entred the ſuburbes, conſtrained them to retire; and Luke Maluezzo coming a litle after on the other ſide of the riuer with the other part, retired alſo: and both theſe ioyning together, incamped in the village of S. Martin within fiue miles of Verona, where vnderſtanding that two thouſand Almain footmen iſſued out of Baſciana, were gone to make pillage about Ciuitella, turning that way, they encloſed them in a valley called Fidato: but the Almaines being ſuccoured by thoſe of Baſciana, made their way by force, though not without ſome hurt by reaſon of the ſtraite paſſages, and leauing Baſciana abandoned, the Venetians tooke it. From Baſciana part of the armie went to Feltre and Ciuital, which places after they had recouered, they preſented themſelues before the Rocke of Eſcalo, which was taken as ſoone as the artilleries were planted. At the ſame time Anthonie and Hierome Sauorgniana, Gentlemen that followed the Venetians in the countrey of Friul, tooke Newcaſtle, which ſtandeth on a rough mountaine in the midſt of the Patrimonie (ſo is that part of Friul called which is beyond the riuer of Taillement:) and all this while there was no other thing heard of Maximilian (who being moued with the action of Vincenſa, was ſuddenly come to Pietra) then vaine rumours, and that he often trauelled from one place to another in great diligence, but without any effect.

The Venetian armie at Vincenſa.

After this, the Venetian armie drew towards Monſelica and Montagnana, both to recouer Poleſina de Rouigna, and to enter vpon the places of Ferrara, together with ſome boates, which the Senate, (reiecting the counſell of the moſt wiſe Senators, who iudged it raſhneſſe to intangle themſelues with new enterpriſes) had determined to ſend againſt the Duke of Ferrara, well furniſhed with ſtrength and munition along the riuer of Po. They were moued to this action, not ſo much for the profite of the affaires preſent, as for the incredible hatred they had conceiued againſt him: it ſeeming to them that they could not iuſtly complaine of that he had done, to ſhake off the yoke of Vicedomino, and to recouer Poleſina; but that they ought not to ſuffer, that not being content with that which he pretended to appertaine to him by right, he aſpired to retaine that which did no way appertaine vnto him; for that at ſuch time as Ceſar raiſed his ſiege from before Padua, he receiued of him in fee the borough of Eſte (from whence is ſprong the ſurname of the family of Eſte) and by way of pawne, the borough Montagnana, for aſſurance of the money that he had lent him; to which places he had no right at all. They added hereunto the remembrance that his ſouldiers in the recouerie of Poleſina, puſhed on with an incredible hatred againſt the Venetian name, had executed great harmes vpon the Gentlemen, raging cruelly againſt their houſes, and ſetting them on fire. In theſe reſpects it was agreed, that their nauie commanded by Ange Treuiſan, compounded of ſixteene galleys, with a great number of ſmaller veſſels well furniſhed with men of warre, ſhould ſaile towards Ferrara: the which armie being en-tred into Po by the mouth of Fornacies, and hauing burnt Coruola with certaine other villages neare to Po, went ſpoiling all the countrey vp to the lake of Scuro, from which place the light horſemen who followed them as a ſtrength by land, made incurſions as farre as Ficherolo, which is rather a houſe of pleaſure then a Caſtle, but of great reputation, for that Robert S. Seuerin lay long time before it, being Captaine to the Venetians in the warre which they had againſt Hercules father to Alphonſo. The coming of this nauie, together with the rumor of the armie by land that was to follow, brought no litle amaze to the Duke of Ferrara, who, hauing but a ſlender ſtrength of ſouldiers, and the inhabitants of Ferrara, either for their ſmall numbers, or for their ignorance in warre, not ſufficient enough to oppoſe againſt ſuch a danger, he had no other meane to defend himſelfe vntill the ſuccours which he expected from the Pope and French king were come vnto him, then to let with force of ſhot beſtowed vpon the brinke of Po, that the enemies ſhould paſſe no further: for which cauſe when Treuiſan had in vaine aſſayed to paſſe, and ſeeing he could aduance nothing except he were ſuccoured by land, he came to an anker in the midſt of the riuer of Po behind a litle Ile, right ouer againſt Puliſelle, a place within eleuen miles of Ferrara, and very apt to annoy the towne. His intention was to expect there the army, who had gotten all Poleſina without any difficultie, hauing firſt recouered Montagnana by compoſition, whereby the magiſtrates of Ferrara were deliuered to them as priſoners, together with the Captaines of the footmen that were within. In this time of expectation of the armie, for the more ſafe riding of the galleys in the place where they lay, Treuiſan began to raiſe two baſtillions vpon the banks of Po, the one on that ſide to Ferrara, the other vpon the ſhore right againſt it, caſting withall a bridge vpon the veſſels to haue the more oportunitie to ſuccour that baſtillion that was on Ferrara ſide: the finiſhing whereof, the Duke purpoſing to hinder, but with a counſell haply more couragious then diſcreete, hauing called together as many of the youth of the towne as he could, with ſuch companies of ſouldiers as came to his pay, he ſent them continually to aſſaile the baſtillion on a ſudden: but the defendants receiuing ſuccous of their peoples which iſſued out of the veſſels, began to diſorder the enemie and put them to flight; and albeit the Duke himſelfe came to the medley with a freſh ſuccour of horſemen, and with his preſence brought a new heart to moſt of his people not trained in warre, and reduced them into order, yet ſuch was the furie of the enemie, for whom the ſuretie of the place fought, being manned with many peeces of ſmall ſhot, that in the end he was conſtrained to retire, leauing many of his people either dead or taken, and that not ſo many of the vnexperienced and baſe multitude, as of the moſt braue ſouldiers and nobilitie of Ferrara; amongſt whom was Hercules Cantelmo, a yong man of great hope, whoſe anceſtors aforetime were Dukes of Sore in the kingdome of Naples: for as certaine Slauonian ſouldiers led him priſoner into a galley, and contending amongſt themſelues to which of them he ſhould be priſoner, there was one of them, who, with a rare example of barbarous crueltie, miſerably ſtroke off his head. Wherefore the towne of Ferrara ſeeming to all men to be in great danger, Monſieur de Chaumont ſent to the ſuccours of it the Lord of Chaſtillion with an hundred and fiftie French Lances: and the Pope being kindled againſt the Venetians for entring into that action without any regard to the ſuperioritie which the Church hath there, appointed the two hundred men at armes which he had ſent to Cæſars aide, to be conuerted to the defence of Ferrara. But theſe ſuccours haply had come too late, if the Venetians had not bene compelled to looke to the defence of their owne eſtate. For as the troubles wherein Maximilian was (as hath bene declared before) were nothing grieuous to the French King, partly for the continuall feare he had of his proſperitie, and partly for that burning in deſire to make himſelfe Lord of Verona, he hoped by reaſon of his neceſſities to haue it of him at laſt, either by purchaſe or by engaging: but on the other ſide he was much diſpleaſed that the Venetian greatneſſe was eſtſoones reeſtabliſhed, which would turne him to continuall perill and perplexitie for his Duchie of Millan. And therefore Cæſar not hauing ſufficiently furniſhed Verona for want of money, the French King was conſtrained to enter into care of things, and by ſending thither new companies, beſides thoſe men at armes which were there already, ſo to prouide that that Citie returned not to their obedience. To this Monſieur de Chaumont gaue beginning, who, after the loſſe of Vincenſa, being come vpon the marches of Verona, he retained in the French kings pay two thouſand Spaniſh footmen, which were within Verona, who began to draw into tumult for want of paiment: and he ſent thither for a greater ſuretie, other bands of footmen, according to the aduice of Triuulce; who, for that Monſieur de Chaumont feared leſt

the King would be diſcontented with ſo great expences, made anſwer, that it was better the King ſhould charge him with the expence of his money, then to haue loſt or put in danger his eſtate. Beſides this, he lent to Ceſar eight thouſand duckats to pay the ſouldiers that were within Verona, but receiuing in pawne for the repaiment of that ſumme and others which afterward he ſhould aduance for his affaires, the towne of Vallegge, a place which the King eſteemed much for the ſuretie of Breſſe, for as much as it is within fiue miles of Breſſe, and is a paſſage ouer Mincia; yea ſuch a one, as he who poſſeſſeth Vallegge and Peſquiero, is maiſter of that riuer. The comming of Monſieur de Chaumont being followed with the moſt part of the Lances in the Duchie of Millan, together with the companies which he had put into Verona, and the rumour that ran of his preparation to beſiege Vincenſa, were the cauſes that the Venetian armie, leauing for the defence of Poleſina and to ſuccour their nauie, foure hundred light horſemen and foure hundred footmen, retired from the country of Ferrara, deuiding themſelues into Legnaguo, Soaue, & Vincenſa: and being carefull to aſſure Vincenſa, and to prouide that the country thereabout were not diſtreſſed by the garriſon of Verona, they fortified it with a wonderfull trench, large and full of water, enuironed with a rampier, whereon were diſperſed many baſtillions. It began from the foote of the mountaine which lieth below Soaue, and reaching about fiue miles along the plaine that leades from Rouigna to Montfort, it ended neare to certaine mariſhes which ioyne to the riuer of Adice. They alſo fortified Soaue and Legnaguo, by which meanes ſtanding vpon their gard, they aſſured all the countrey, chiefly for the winter ſeaſon. By the departure of the Venetian regiments, the danger of Ferrara was ſomewhat diminiſhed, but not altogether taken away; for though they were acquited of all feare to be forced, yet they were troubled with a ſuſpition leſt the people for the great harmes they receiued would diminiſh, or elſe fall into the laſt deſpaire. For the ſouldiers of the nauie and their followers, ranne vp euery day euen to the gates of the towne, and other veſſels of the Venetians which had on another ſide aſſailed the ſtate of the Duke of Ferrara, had taken Comachio. About this time arriued the companies of the Pope and the French king, and therefore the Duke, who (being warned afore by the harmes receiued in the aſſault of the baſtillion) was incamped in a ſtrong place neare to Ferrara, began to make many incurſions, to draw the enemies to battell, who hoping that their armie would returne, refuſed to fight vntil then. And it hapned one day that the Cardinall of Eſte hauing run vp neare to the baſtillion, as he returned backe, a ſhot came out of one of the veſſels of the enemies, which carried away the head of the Count Lodowike de la Mirandola, one of the Captaines of the Church, none other in ſo great a multitude being hurt, either with that or any other ſhot. At laſt the knowledge of the countrey, and of the nature and oportunitie of the riuer, made eaſie that which in the beginning had ſeemed hard and dangerous. For the Duke and the Cardinall, hoping to be able to deſtroy their nauie with the artillerie, if they could by any meanes bring it ſafely vpon the banke of the riuer, the Cardinall returned to charge the baſtillion with part of the bands, and giuing the repulſe to the enemie which were iſſued out to the skirmiſh, and making ſlaughter of ſome of them, he occupied and fortified that part that was next to the riſing, and ſo without all priuitie and knowledge of the enemie, vpon the beginning of the night, he drew the artillerie to the banke ſide right ouer againſt them, and planting it with great ſilence, he began to ſhoote vpon the enemies with a wonderfull furie. The veſſels ſought to ſaue themſelues by flying, but becauſe there was a long traine of great peeces of artillerie, which managed by men experienced, beat afar off, they rather changed the place of peril, then auoided ỹ danger, ſpecially when the Duke himſelf came vnto thẽ, who knew both how to make artilleries, & how to manage them. By reaſon of ſo many ſhots of artillerie, notwithſtanding the enemies for their part ceaſſed not to ſhoot, but in vaine, for that they that played vpon the brinke were couered with the riſing of the hill, their veſſels were conſumed with ſundry miſerable aduentures. Some of them that could no more gouerne themſelues againſt the furie of the ſhot, yeelded; others, being ſet on fire by the ſhot of the artilleries, were miſerably burnt with the men that were in them: others, for that they would not fall into the hands of the enemie, ſunke themſelues: and the Generall, leaping into a litle skiffe almoſt in the beginning of the skirmiſh, found ſafetie by the ſwiftnes of his oares, and his gally being galled through both ſides, was ſunk after it had fled about three miles, vſing continuall defence againſt the aduerſitie of her fortune. To be ſhort, the riuer being full of bloud, of fire, and of dead bodies, fifteene galleys fell into the power of the Duke, with certaine great ſhips, many foiſts, and an infinite number of ſmall veſſels. There died

A memorable accident.

about two thouſand bodies, ſome by ſhot, ſome by fire, and ſome by water: threeſcore enſignes were taken, but not the principall ſtandard, which was ſaued with the Generall: many recouered the ſhore, whereof ſome were gathered vp by the Venetian light horſemen, and ſaued by that meanes; others being purſued by the enemie, were taken priſoners, and others in flying receiued many harmes by the paiſants. The veſſels taken were carried to Ferrara, where, in memorie of ſo great a victorie, they were kept many yeares, vntill Duke Alphonſo hauing a deſire to gratifie the Venetians, made reſtitution. Immediatly after the ouerthrow of this nauie, Duke Alphonſo diſpatched with expedition three hundred horſemen and fiue hundred footmen to do the like to them that had taken Comachio, who recouered Loretto which the Venetians had fortified, and as it was thought, had broken the whole armie, if, ſeeing into their danger, they had not retired to Bebia, finding more ſuretie to auoide the perill, then to hope in fortune. This was the end of the ſiege of Ferrara, which continued about a moneth, the euent and iſſue whereof (which ordinarily is the true touchſtone whereby men may iudge of things) did well declare how much wiſer were the counſels of a few, who perſwaded that leauing all other enterpriſes, and reſeruing their treaſures to be employed in actions more conuenient and profitable, they ſhould onely looke to the preſeruation of Padua, Treuiſa, with other places recouered; then of ſuch, who though more in number, yet inferiour in diſcretion, and pricked forward with paſſions of hate and diſdaine, tooke pleaſure to be intangled with ſo many enterpriſes, which being vndertaken raſhly, were at laſt the cauſe of incredible expences, with ſhame & loſſe to the Commonweale. But about Padua, matters ſucceeded rather to the furtherance of the Venetians then otherwiſe. For, Cæſar keeping vpon the country of Vincenſa with foure thouſand footmen, a part of the regiment of the Venetians (and that neither ſtrong nor great) with the aide of the paiſants of that quarter, tooke almoſt before his eyes, the paſſage of Eſcalo, Cogolo and Baſciana, which is a place of importance, & conuenient to hinder the deſcending of the Almaines into Italy: and he complaining that by the departure of Monſieur la Paliſſa many diſorders had befallen him, went at laſt to Boſſana to aſſiſt the Diot which by his appointment was to be kept at Inſpruch: according to which example, Monſieur de Chaumont left off all his thoughts and deſires to performe the enterpriſe of Vincenſa and Legnaguo, conſidering withall that thoſe places were well manned and fortified, and the ſeaſon of the time very contrary; and retired to Millan, leauing good garriſon within Breſſe, Peſquiero and Valegge; and within Verona (for that Cæſar of himſelfe was not able to defend it) he beſtowed ſixe hundred Lances and foure thouſand footmen, who being ſeparate from the ſouldiers of Cæſar, were lodged in the ſuburbes of S. Zena, hauing yet the Citadell in their power for their greater ſuretie. Verona a noble and ancient Citie, is deuided by the riuer of Adice, a riuer both large and deepe coming from the mountaines of Almaine, and as it falls into the plaine, it goeth crooking on the left hand, touching vpon the foote of the mountaines, and ſo entreth into Verona, and when it iſſueth out, it runneth from the mountaines and ſpreadeth into a pleaſant and fertile plaine. That part of Verona which hath his ſituation vpon the deſcent and ſomewhat into the plaine, is beyond Adice towards Almaine: the other on this ſide Adice, and all in a goodly plaine, hauing Mantua for his proſpect. Vpon the mountaine neare S. Georges gate, ſtandeth the Caſtle of S. Peter, and within two croſ-bowes ſhot from thence drawing againſt the hill, is the Caſtle of S. Felix, ſtanding vpon the very top of the hill, both the one and the other being farre better fenced by the nature of the place then by art; and yet to loſe them, for that by the aduantage of their ſituation they commanded the Citie, were to put Verona in manifeſt danger. Theſe Caſtles were kept by the Lanceknights: but in the other part which is ſeparate from this by the riuer, is the old Caſtle looking towards Peſquiero, and hath his ſituation almoſt in the midſt of the Citie, going croſſe the riuer with a bridge: and three croſ-bowes ſhot from thence towards Vincenſa, ſtands the Citadell, and betweene them both, the walls of the Citie ioyne without, in forme of halfe a circle; but within, is a wall going from the one to the other, which is betweene two great ditches, and the ſpace betweene both the wals is called the ſuburbes of S. Zena, which, with the guard of the Citadell was appointed for the lodging of the French. Now whileſt armes were there as it were in reſt, Maximilian ſolicited continually to make truce with the Venetians, the Pope alſo interpoſing very diligently by the working of Achilles de Graſſi Biſhop of Peſere, and his Nuncio: and to this end his Embaſſadours went to the Hoſpitall which is aboue Eſcalo, to negociate with Iohn Cornaro and Lewis Monſenigno Embaſſadours for the Venetians. But by reaſon of the exceſſiue demands of Deſcription of Verona.

Cæſar, this conference tooke no effect, to the great diſcontentment of the Pope, who wiſhed that the Venetians might be deliuered of all trouble, with whom he had wrought ſo much, to the end there ſhould be no matter of queſtion, to render to the Duke of Ferrara the towne of Comacho, which they had burned before: and they had promiſed him to vexe no more the eſtate of the Duke of Ferrara, whom he fauoured and ſupported much, both to make him beholding to him, for that he had obtained, and was to obtaine by his meane; and alſo for the hope he had that hereafter he would depend more vpon him then of the French king; againſt whom, being in continuall ſtudie to lay foundations of right great importance, he had ſecretly diſpatched a meſſenger to the King of England, and begun to work the Swiſſers, who were at that time entred into ſome quarrell with the French King: and when the Biſhop of Sion (whom the Latins call Sedunenſis) enemy to the French King, who by this meanes ſought to be Cardinal, came vnto him, he receiued him with great ioy.

About the end of this yeare, Maximilian and the King Catholike were reconciled, who were at diſcord touching the gouernment of the Realmes of Caſtile. This controuerſie was long debated in the Court of France; and albeit it ſuffered many great difficulties, yet in the end it was brought to perfection by the vndiſcreete counſell of the Cardinall of Amboiſe, who conſidered not how much this vnion was hurtfull to the affaires of his King. But, it may be, he thought that if by his working they might come to agreement, it would be a good meane to raiſe him to the Popedome. He wrought ſo then by his diligence and authoritie, that he induced Maximilian to conſent that the King Catholike, in caſe he had no iſſue males, ſhould be gouernour ouer thoſe Realmes vntill their litle ſonne Charles were come to the age of fiue and twentie yeers, who ſhould not take vpon him the title of King during the life of his mother who had the title of Queene, for that in Caſtile the males exclude not the females: That the King Catholicke ſhould pay to Cæſar fiftie thouſand duckats: That he ſhould aide him according to the treatie of Cambray, vntill he had conquered and recouered all that appertained to him: And laſtly, to pay to Charles euery yeare fortie thouſand duckats. By which conuention the King of Aragon was confirmed Gouernor ouer the Realme of Caſtile, and ſtanding now in ſtate to haue credite with Cæſar, ſince all controuerſies were determined, and that they both had equall intereſts touching their nephew; he might now more boldly looke into the meanes by which he might hinder the greatneſſe of the French King, which was alwayes ſuſpected vnto him in regard of the kingdome of Naples. About this time, the Pope entred into ſuſpition, that the Pronotarie Bentiuole remaining at Cremona, laboured ſecretly to returne into Bologna, for which cauſe he cauſed Iulian de Medicis to be retained in the Pallace of Bologna for certaine dayes: and attributing all things to the hatred of the French King againſt him, he made knowne the feare he had, leſt he would paſſe into Italy to ſubdue it, and to make Pope by violence the Cardinall of Amboiſe: and yet at the ſame time, he ſpake openly in derogation of the honor of Cæſar, as of a perſon incapable of ſuch a dignitie; and who by his incapacitie had brought the name of the Empire into great contempt. About the end of this yeare died the Count Petillane, Generall of the Venetians, a man of great age and long experience in the art militarie, and of that credite and truſt, that the Venetians neuer feared he would by raſhneſſe put their State in danger.

The Emperour and the king Catholike fall to accord touching the gouernment of Caſtile.

The death of the Count Petillane.

The yeare after, which was the yeare 1510, the ſame doubts and ſuſpitions continuing, warres began to ſtirre on all parts, but coldly, and according to the ſeaſon. For the Venetian armie lying encamped at S. Boniface vpon the countrey of Verona, held Verona as it were beſieged: from whence Charles Baillon, Federike de Boſſolo, and Sacromoro Viſcount, comming to their ſuccours, were charged by the eſtradiots, who ouerthrew them, and tooke priſoners Charles and Sacromoro, for Federike found ſafetie in the reſcue of the French, which iſſued out of Verona to their ſuccours: and a litle after, theſe eſtradiots brake another band of French horſemen, amongſt whom Monſieur de Ceſy was taken priſoner: and on the other ſide, two hundred French Lances iſſuing out of Verona with three thouſand footmen, tooke by aſſault a baſtillion towards Soaue, which was guarded by ſixe hundred footmen, and in their returne they ouerthrew a great multitude of paiſants. But whileſt the warre went on thus coldly, the minds of the Princes were in great paine and care, but ſpecially Cæſar, who not knowing how he might carrie the victorie of the warre againſt the Venetians, and poſting ouer (according to his cuſtome) his affaires from one Diot to another, had cauſed to be publiſhed the Diot at Auſburg; and being kindled againſt the Pope, for that the Electors of the Empire, puſhed on by his authoritie, made inſtance to negociate

ciate in the Diot rather for peace with the Venetians, then for prouiſions for the warre, he had cauſed to depart from Auſpurg the Biſhop of Peſere his Nuncio: and conſidering that the deliberations of Diots were vncertaine, tedious, and full of difficulties, the end of one breeding the beginning of another; and that the French King excuſed himſelfe dayly of the demands and enterpriſes that were propoſed to him, ſometimes alledging the ſharpneſſe of the ſeaſon, ſometimes requiring aſſignation certaine of the expences which were to be made, and eſtſoones proteſting that by the treatie of Cambray, he was not bound to aide him alone, but ioyntly with the Pope and King of Aragon, with whom it was reaſonable that the proceedings ſhould be mutual & common, as the confederation and bond was ioynt and general. For theſe reaſons, he entred into reſolution, that there was no remedie more readie for his affaires, then to induce the French King to embrace the enterpriſe to take Padua, Vincenſa and Treuiſa with his owne forces, and taking ſufficient recompence: which thing was liked by many of the Kings Councell, who conſidering that till the Venetians were wholly chaſed out of the firme land, the King ſhould dwell in continuall expences and dangers, perſwaded his Maieſtie vpon theſe reaſons, to free himſelfe of that feare with one great expence. And the King ſhewed himſelfe not altogether eſtranged from this counſell, being carried with the ſame reaſon, and therefore inclined to paſſe in perſon into Italy with a mightie armie (which he called mightie and puiſſant as often as he had in the ſame more then ſixteene hundred Lances, with his Gentlemen and Penſioners,) and yet being drawne by other reaſons into another mind, he ſtood very doubtfull in his mind, and more confuſed then he was wont, for that the Cardinall of Amboiſe, a man of great authoritie and ſtomacke, afflicted with a long and grieuous maladie, looked no more to his affaires, which were wont to be diſpatched wholly by his direction. The King, beſides that of his naturall diſpoſition, he loued not great expences, was retained alſo by a deſire he had to Verona; for the accompliſhing whereof, it ſeemed to him a good meanes to haue Ceſar intangled with continuall warres: for which regard he had newly lent to him eighteene thouſand duckats to pay the Lanceknights that lay in garriſon in Verona, and promiſed him to make it vp fiftie thouſand, with condition that he might not onely hold the Citadell for his ſecuritie and pawne, but alſo the old Caſtle ſhould be ſet ouer to him, together with the next gate of the towne, the better to haue free entrie and iſſue: and that if the money were not reſtored to him within one yeare, the towne of Valegge ſhould remaine to him in perpetuall gouernment, with power to fortifie as well the towne as the Citadell at the charges of Ceſar. Theſe conſiderations drew the Kings mind into no ſmall doubts, but much more was he troubled with feare, leſt the Popes intentions would wholly vary and alter, if he ſhould either leade or ſend into Italy a new armie. For, the Pope, full of ſuſpition, and alſo ill contented that he ſhould ſeiſe vpon Verona, beſides that he perſeuered ſtill in a will to abſolue the Venetians, did all that he could to ioyne himſelfe with the Swiſſers: for which intent, he had ſent backe againe into that countrey, the Biſhop of Sion, with money to diſtribute amongſt them, and promiſe to indue himſelfe with the Cardinals Hat: and ſought with all his diligence, by what meanes he might eſtrange the King of England from the amitie of the French King; whom albeit his father at the inſtant of death had aduiſed, for his ſecuritie and benefite, to continue in aſſured league with him, and for that reſpect was yearely payed fiftie thouſand duckats: yet, being carried with the hote humours of youth, and the great quantitie of treaſure that his father had left him, it ſeemed he had no leſſe in conſideration the counſels of thoſe, who for the deſire of new things, and for an ancient hatred which the Engliſh do ordinarily beare to the French nation, perſwaded him for the warre, then the wiſedome and diſcreet example of his father, who refuſing all contentions with the French, had gouerned his kingdome in great obedience and tranquillitie, notwithſtanding he had aſpired to a ſtate new and full of troubles. All theſe things troubling not a litle the minde of the French King, who, the better to prouide for the affaires of Italy, was now gone to Lions, he feared leſt his marching into Italy, which the Pope deteſted openly, would ſtirre vp ſome new innouations by his meanes: and beſides, he ſaw that the King of Aragon diſſwaded him from it, but vnder demonſtrations of a friend, and as a louer of the common tranquillitie: in ſo much as amid theſe doubts which trauelled him on all parts, he had no more certaine nor preſent counſell, then with great labour and diligence, to ſtudie ſo to appeaſe the mind of the Pope, that at the leaſt he might ſtand aſſured that he were not his enemie. And in this thing it ſeemed occaſion fauored him greatly, for that it was beleeued, that by the death of the Cardinall of Amboyſe, who who was extremely ſicke, he ſhould be eaſed of thoſe ſuſpitions, from whence it was ſuppoſed his ill contentments did principally proceed. And for that the King was aduertiſed by good intelligence, that the Cardinall of Auchx, nephew to the Cardinall of Amboyſe, with others that managed his affaires in the Court of Rome, had with great raſhneſſe both in deed and with words laboured more to quicken and kindle, then to appeaſe and mollifie the Popes mind, as had bene very neceſſary, he would no more vſe their ſeruice in thoſe actions, but ſent to Rome in poſt the Lord Albert Pio Earle of Carpie, a man of great wit and dexteritie, to whom were giuen very large commiſſions, not onely to offer to the Pope the Kings forces and authoritie to ſerue his turne in all accidents, and vpon all occaſions, accommodating himſelfe as much as he could to his will and nature, but alſo to communicate with him frankly and ſimply the ſtate of all things that were practiſed, together with the requeſts that Ceſar made to him; and finally to referre to his will whether he ſhould paſſe into Italy or not, and whether he ſhould miniſter to the Emperour ſpeedily or ſlowly. He had alſo in charge to diſſwade the abſolution of the Venetians; but before he arriued, it was alreadie reſolued and promiſed by the Pope: becauſe the Venetians after long diſpute of their Embaſſadours with the Popes Delegates, which continued many moneths, conſented at laſt to the conditions, whereupon the difficulties ſtood, not finding any other remedie for their ſafetie, then to be ioyned with him. The conditions for the which the abſolution was to be giuen, were openly publiſhed in the Conſiſtorie the foure and twentieth day of February, in preſence of the ſame Venetian Embaſſadors, who confirmed thē by writing, according to the authentike direction from their Commonweale. Theſe were the particulars: That they ſhould not in any ſort diſpoſe of the benefices or dignities of the Church: and that they ſhould make no reſiſtance or difficultie againſt whatſoeuer ſhall be determined in the Court of Rome concerning the ſame: That they ſhould not gainſay that in that Court ſhould be proſecuted the cauſes for benefices with others appertaining to the Eccleſiaſtike iuriſdiction: That they ſhould not charge the goods of the Church, and exempt places of their temporall dominion, with tenths or any other ſorts of impoſition: That they ſhould renounce from the appeale againſt the Popes cenſure, and all rights gotten vpon the Church lands in what ſort ſoeuer, but ſpecially from all thoſe prerogatiues and rights by the which they pretended to hold the office of Vicedomino in Ferrara: That the ſubiects of the Church and their veſſels may freely traffike through their Gulfe, and that with ſuch ample facultie, that the merchandize of other nations brought in their bottomes, ſhould not be troubled nor ſubiect to pay any toll: That it ſhould not be lawfull for them in any ſort to meddle with Ferrara, or any townes of that State which were dependant on the Church: That all couenants and contracts which they had made to the preiudice of the Church, with any the ſubiects or vaſſals of the ſame, ſhould be cancelled and made voide: That they ſhould not receiue any Duke, Baron, or other ſubiect or vaſſall of the Church, that ſhould be an enemie or rebell to the ſea Apoſtolicke: That they ſhould be bound to make reſtitution of all the moneys which they had exacted vpon the reuenues of the Church, and to make amends for all the harmes which the Church had ſuffered thereby. Theſe obligations with the promiſes and ſufficient renouncements, being receiued in the Conſiſtorie, the Venetian Embaſſadours at a day appointed, according to ancient examples, were brought vnder the portall of the great Church of S. Peter, where falling at the Popes feete, being ſet in his Pontificall ſeate neare the brazen gates, aſſiſted with all the Colledge of Cardinals and a great number of Prelates, they asked him pardon in great humilitie, confeſſing their contumacie and faults committed: and after this, according to the cuſtome of the Church, were pronounced certaine prayers, and the vſuall ceremonies being ſolemnely performed, the Pope receiuing them into grace, gaue them abſolution, and enioyned them for penance to go viſite the ſeuen Churches. When they were abſolued, they entred into S. Peters Church, being guided by the great Penitenciarie: and after they had heard Maſſe, which was denied to them before, they were very honorably accompanied to their houſes by many Prelates and Courtiers, and not as perſons excommunicated and interdicted, but as reconciled Chriſtians and deuout children to the ſea Apoſtolike. Soone after they returned to Venice, leauing behind them at Rome Hieronymo Donato, a very learned man, and one of their number, who by his vertues and dexteritie of wit, becoming very agreeable to the Pope, did afterwards great ſeruice to his countrey in things which he negociated with him.

The Argvment.

Pope Iulio the ſecond forſaketh the league of Cambray, and practiſeth againſt the French King and the Emperor: he fauoureth the Venetians, and falleth out with the Duke of Ferrara. The French King and the Emperour enter league againſt the Venetians. Legnago taken by the French. The death of the Cardinall of Amboiſe. The Pope determineth to chaſe the French out of Italy. The Venetians beſiege Verona. The Pope taketh Mirandola, and makes warre vpon the Duke of Ferrara. The families of Bentiuole returne to Bologna. A Councell is publiſhed at Piſa againſt the Pope.

Maximilian was much moued for this abſolution which the Pope gaue to the Venetians with ſo reſolute a will, for as much as it touched him principally; but the French King was not much leſſe vexed, for that he deſired for his priuate profite that the greatneſſe of the Venetians ſhould not be eſtſoones reeſtabliſhed: neuertheleſſe he could not find out what were the intentions and laſt ends of the Pope: but feeding himſelfe with vain hopes concerning the difficulties of the affaires that were prepared againſt him, he perſwaded himſelfe that the Pope ſtirred onely for ſuſpition of his vniting with Maximilian; and that temporiſing with him, and giuing him no occaſion of greater feare, he would paſſe no further, but reſt ſatisfied with the abſolution he had giuen. But the Pope, growing more and more confirmed in his deliberation, and notwithſtanding the declarations and impediments of the confederate Embaſſadours, ſuffered the ſubiects and dependants of the Church to enter into the pay of the Venetians, who receiued into entertainment Iohn Paul Baillon as Generall of all their companies, ſtanding without a Gouernour ſince the death of the Count Petillanè: and tooke alſo into their wages Iohn Lewis and Iohn Vitelli, ſonnes to the late Iohn and Camilla, and made Ranſo de Cere Colonell of their footmen. And as in this action he made open declaration that he tooke the Venetians into his protection, ſo he laboured alſo to bring them to agreement with Cæſar, hoping by that meanes, not onely to ſeparate him from the French King, but withall to knit him with himſelf and with the Venetians to make warre vpon the King. And for the more eaſie ſucceeding of this deuice, taking his oportunitie vpon the neceſſities of Cæſar, he interpoſed his authoritie with the Electors of the Empire and the free townes, to the end that in the Diot of Auſburg there ſhould be no conſent of contribution. But the more he aduanced this practiſe, the more difficult he found it: for that Cæſar would not hearken to any motion of agreement, vnleſſe Verona might remaine to him: and the Venetians (in whom the Pope had hope of a greater facilitie) perſwading themſelues to be able to defend Padua in all fortunes, and that keeping that Citie, time would fauour them with more occaſions, demanded reſolutely the reſtitution of Verona, offering to pay in recompence a very great ſumme of money. The Pope omitted not alſo to make ſecret ſolicitation to the King of England, to raiſe warre againſt the French King, putting him in mind of the ancient emulations of thoſe two kingdomes, ſhewing him the occaſion which offered him a moſt happie ſucceſſe: for that if he would begin to leuie armes againſt the French King, many others, to whom his puiſſance and greatneſſe was either ſuſpected or hated, would do the like: and he encouraged him to embrace with that deuotion which had bene proper to the Kings of England, the glorie that was offered him, to be protector and preſeruer of the ſea Apoſtolike, which otherwiſe ſtood in manifeſt danger by the ambition of the French King: and in this practiſe the King of Aragon did communicate with the Pope, but very ſecretly. But (which was of greater importance) the Pope continuing ſtill with the Swiſſers the practiſes which were begun by the Biſhop of Sion, whoſe authoritie was great

in that nation, and who ceaſſed not to make orations with great efficacie to this effect in their aſſemblies and councels, and to preach it in their Churches; he obtained at laſt that the Swiſſers, receiuing euery yeare a thouſand Florins of Rhein for euery Canton, ſhould be bound to the protection of him and the eſtate of the Church, with permiſſion to the Pope (for his defence againſt all men that would vexe him) to leuie certain proportions of footmen: and that which moſt helped him to obtaine this matter the more eaſily, was the diſagreement that began to kindle betweene them and the French King. For the Swiſſers becoming proud by the eſtimation that others had of them, and preſuming that all the victories obtained in Italy by the King now reigning, or by King Charles his predeceſſor, proceeded principally by their valour and of the feare of their armes, and that therefore they merited much of the Crowne of France; they demanded (the King ſoliciting them to make renouation of the alliance that now was determined) that he would augment their penſions, being then threeſcore thouſand Frankes by yeare, ouer and aboue the mercenarie contributions which were ſecretly diſperſed amongſt priuate perſons; penſions which had bene begun vnder Lewis the eleuenth, and continued vnto the preſent time. But for that they made their demands with preſumptuous audacitie, the King being offended with their inſolencie, and for that of peaſants and mountaine men (ſuch was his phraſe) they ſought ſo imperiouſly to taxe him, he began to ſhake them off with haughtie words, and in a maner to make ſhew as though he diſdained them, more reſpecting his dignitie royall, then regarding the preſent vtilitie: whereunto he was the more induced, for that at the ſame ſeaſon by the ſolicitation of George Sopreſſan, the Valeſians ſubiects of Sion, who were gouerned in ſeuen communities, which they call Courts, being corrupted by briberies and promiſes of penſions, were not onely confederate with him, but alſo bound to giue paſſage to his people, and refuſe it to his enemies, and withall to enter into his pay with ſuch numbers of footmen as their forces were able to beare: and in the ſame ſort did enter confederacy with him, the Lords of the three leagues, whom they call Griſons. And albeit part of the Valeſians had not yet approued theſe conditions, the King hoped to induce them to the ratification by the ſame meanes: in ſo much as he began to perſwade himſelfe that the amitie of the Swiſſers was now no more ſo neceſſarie to him, hauing determination to ſupply his warres with Almaine footmen, ouer and beſides the companies of the Valeſians and Griſons, and ſo ſtood in litle feare of their ſtirres, for that he beleeued they were not able to aſſaile the Duchie of Millan but by the ſtraits of Bellinſona, and other paſſages of great difficultie, through the which, if they ſhould march in great troupes, they might be eaſily reduced into neceſſitie of victuals by a ſmall armie: and if they came but in ſmall companies, a ſlender ſtrength would likewiſe ſuffice to make them retire. Thus remaining reſolute not to augment their penſions, he could not obtaine in the councels of the Swiſſers a renouation of the alliance, notwithſtanding many among them did earneſtly perſwade it, to whom in particular were retributed no ſmall rewards: and for that cauſe they conſented more eaſily to the confederation which was demanded of them by the Pope. By which new confederation the Pope ſeeming to haue layed a great foundation for the aduancing of his purpoſes; and beſides, proceeding in all things according to his nature, as ſuperiour to all men; and as though all muſt of neceſſitie receiue lawes of him, he began to ſow ſeeds of new controuerſies with the Duke of Ferrara, either puſhed on by the cauſe that was in queſtion betweene them, or elſe by hatred, for that hauing receiued of him ſo many benefites and honours, he depended more of the French King then of him. But whatſoeuer the cauſe was, ſearching a beginning of quarrels, he imperiouſly commanded Alphonſo Duke of Ferrara to ſurceaſſe the working of ſalt at Comachio; for that it was not reaſonable that that which was not lawfull to him when the Venetians held Ceruia, ſhould now haue ſufferance, being poſſeſſed by the ſea Apoſtolike, to whom appertained the abſolute gouernment of Ferrara and Comachio: beſides, it was a matter of great profite, for that the working ceaſſing at Comachio, the ſaltpits of Ceruia miniſtred traffike to all the townes thereabouts. But Duke Alphonſo, who repoſed more in the coniunction which he had with the French King and in his protection, then he feared the Popes forces, gaue ſmall obedience to this commandement: but complained that he ſhould be conſtrained not to reape the fruite which grew to him in his proper houſe with ſmall labour, and to be driuen to buy of another for the vſage of his peoples, the ware whereof he had enough to repleniſh forreine countreys, alledging withall, that that ought not to be enforced for an example, which the Venetians had made him conſent vnto, more by force of armes then by courſe of iuſtice. Wherefore the Pope ſent to command him vnder great paines and accurſings to diſcontinue that worke. Such were the thoughts and actions of the Pope, inclined altogether to raiſe vp and ſupport the Venetians.

The league of Cæſar and the French king againſt the Venetians.

But on the other ſide, Cæſar and the French King, who deſired as much their embaſement, being diſcontented with the demonſtrations which the Pope expreſſed on their behalfe, and for this cauſe being more cloſely knit one to another, they met together, and concluded to inuade the Venetians that Sommer with great forces: and to that end the French King for his part ſhould ſend Monſieur Chaumont with a puiſſant armie, whereunto ſhould be ioyned the Lanceknights that lay at Verona: and on the other ſide, Cæſar ſhould enter into the countrey of Friul with thoſe forces which he hoped to obtaine of the Empire in the Diot of Auſburg: and hauing accompliſhed that action, he was to proceed to other enterpriſes according to the eſtate of occaſions and time. They ſolicited the Pope to ioyne his forces with theirs, according to the bond of the league of Cambray. But he, being much diſcontented with that motion, made anſwer, that he was no more bound to that confederatiõ which had alreadie had his perfectiõ, ſeeing it had bene in the power of Cæſar firſt to haue Treuiſa, and afterwards a recompence in money. Cæſar likewiſe demanded ſuccours from the King Catholike, both by vertue of the ſame capitulations of Cambray, and alſo vnder couenants made particularly with him, at ſuch time as he conſented to him the gouernment of Caſtile: and this ſolicitation was by way of requeſt, rather to aid him with mony then with men; but the King of Aragon being vnwilling to diſfurniſh himſelfe of the thing whereof he had moſt need, made anſwer, That he would ſend him foure hundred Lances: which was a ſtrength of litle profit for Cæſar, for that as wel in the French army as in his owne camp, there were great plentie of horſemen. At this time the Citie of Verona being much afflicted by the ſoldiers that guarded it, for that they were not payd, certain of the Venetian bands, being ſecretly called thither by ſome of the captains, iſſued out of S. Boniface, & approched the Citie by night to ſcale the Caſtle of S. Peter: and as they were entred S. Georges gate, whileſt they taried to faſten their ladders together (for that being ſingle, they ſufficed not to reach to the height of the wall) either they were heard by the warders of the Caſtle of S. Felix, or elſe they ſeeming to heare ſome noiſe, were fearfull, and retired, leauing their ladders behind them. By reaſon whereof the armie returned to S. Boniface, and at Verona the conſpiracie being diſcouered, many were puniſhed. In this ſeaſon the Pope had ſome inclination to be reconciled to the French King, not of good will, but for feare: for that Maximilian by way of brauado ſummoned him to lend him two hundred thouſand duckats, threatning that otherwiſe he would ioyne with the French King againſt him: and for that a bruite was ſpread, that in the Diot of Auſburg it was agreed to miniſter to him a ſtrong ſuccour, and for that peace had bene newly eſtabliſhed betweene the Kings of England and France, and publiſhed with great ſolemnitie: by reaſon whereof, he began to treate in good earneſt with Albert de Carpi, whom till that day, he had entertained with words and hopes generall. But he continued not long in that reſolution, both for that the Diot of Auſburg (without the forces and aides of which, there was no great reckoning to be made of the threats of Cæſar) not anſwering the expectation, determined for him no other ſuccours, then a ſupply of three hundred thouſand Florins of Rhein, in hope of which money he had alreadie made great expences: and the King of England ſignified vnto him that he had ſet downe an article in the peace, wherein was expreſſed that it ſhould be no peace as often as the French King ſhould offend the ſtate of the Church. In regard of theſe things, the Pope reentring into new ſtomacke, and returning to his former thoughts, began to make new complaints againſt the Duke of Ferrara, for that the ſaid Duke ſince it was ſuffered to the ſubiects of the Church to ſaile and traffike frankly through the Gulfe of Venice, had impoſed new tributes vpon the goods which were brought to Venice by the riuer of Po; which thing the Pope alledged, that the vaſſall could not do (according to the order of law) without licence of the Lord of the ſoyle; and that it was a matter of great preiudice to the people of Bologna, who were his ſubiects: and therefore he made inſtance that they might be diſcharged, threatning that otherwiſe he would make warre vpon him: and to put him in the greater feare, he cauſed his bands of men of warre to march into the countrey of Bologna and into Romagna. Theſe things troubled not a litle the mind of the French King, being loath on the one ſide to fall at oddes with the Pope, and on the other ſide he felt himſelfe touched in honour and conſcience not to leaue abandoned the Duke of Ferrara, to whoſe protection he had bound himſelfe by receiuing thir-

tie thousand duckats. And he was no lesse moued with the regard of his proper profite, for that Duke Alphonso depending wholly vpon him, and becoming so much the more at his deuotion, by how much he saw him persecuted by the Pope, and his estate being very commodious for the affaires of Lombardie, he esteemed it his proper interest to preserue him; and therefore he dealt with the Pope to make some accord betweene them by some meanes. But it seemed iust to the Pope that the King should withdraw himselfe from that protection, alledging that he had taken it vpon him against the capitulations of Cambray, by the which (made vnder colour to render to the Church that which was vsurped) it was forbidden that none of the confederates should take into protection any that was named by another, and that for his part, he had named the Duke of Ferrara: and further, that it was forbidden that none of them should meddle with the things appertaining to the Church: That the like also was confirmed in the confederation made particularly betweene them at Biagrasso, wherein was expresly prouided that the King should not keepe in his protection any that depended of the Church, nor should hereafter take any of them into his protection, and should cancel and make void all his former protections. To which things notwithstanding it was answered on the Kings behalfe, that by the same conuention it was prouided, that the King should haue power to dispose of the Bishopricks on this side the Mounts as he listed, which the Pope had violated in the first auoidance that fell, as likewise in fauour of the Venetians, he had broken the capitulations made at Cambray, and that therefore the King was at libertie not to obserue the things he had promised him: yet because he would not come to armes with the Pope for the quarrell of the Duke of Ferrara, he offered conditions, by the which, not offending directly his honor, the Pope in a great part might rest satisfied touching the interests which the Church and he pretended against Duke Alphonso: and besides this, he was content to bind himselfe (according to the Popes request) that the French armies should not passe the riuer of Po, but for the protection of the Florentines whereunto he was bound; and to molest Pandolfe Petrucci and Iohn Paul Baillon, vnder colour of money promised by the one, and detained by the other.

Whilest these things were in action, Monsieur Chaumont with an armie of fifteene hundred Lances, and ten thousand footmen of many nations, amongst whom were some Swissers which were priuatly leuied, and not by permission of the Cantons, being followed with great store of artilleries, with three thousand pioners, and bridges prepared to passe riuers; and hauing ioyned with him the Duke of Ferrara with two hundred men at armes, fiue hundred light horsemen, and two thousand footmen, tooke Polesina de Rouigna without any impediment, the Venetians hauing abandoned it; and taking also the Tower Marquisano standing vpon the riuer of Adice towards Padua, he marched on to Castelbaldo, and had at the first summons the townes of Montagnana and Este, the one appertaining to Alphonso d'Este, by grant from Maximilian, who had giuen him the other in gage. When Alphonso had recouered these places, he sent backe the most part of his regiments vnder colour to encounter certaine galleys of the Venetians, which floted vpon the riuer of Po. The Prince of Henault Maximilians Lieutenant, marched in like sort out of Verona with three hundred French Lances, two hundred men at armes, and three thousand Almaine footmen, and ioyned with Monsieur Chaumont, following him alwayes within one remoue of his campe. They left behind them Monselica, which was holden by the Venetians, and marched towards the countrey of Vincensa, where Lonigua and the whole countrey yeelded without resistance; for that the Venetian armie, which was said to containe fixe hundred men at armes, foure thousand light horsemen and estradiots, and eight thousand footmen vnder Iohn Paul Baillon Generall, and Andrew Gritti Treasurer, hauing first abandoned Soaue, and alwayes retiring into places of suretie according as the enemie aduanced, and lastly hauing bestowed sufficient garrison within Treuisa, and a thousand footmen within Mestro, they were retired to Brentelli, a place within three miles of Padua, and of great suretie for their incamping, both for that the countrey is full of hils and risings, and the place it selfe standeth enuironed with the waters of these three riuers, Brento, Brentello, and Baquillon.

But the people of Vincensa, for that the armie was retired, finding themselues altogether abandoned, and vnable of themselues to defend their Estate, and knowing that they had no other hope then such as they might expect in the mercie of the victors, which they supposed they might more graciously obtaine by the meanes of Monsieur Chaumont; they sent to him to demand safeconduct to addresse Embassadours to him and the Prince of Henault; which being gran-granted, they presented themselues in rufull maner, and full of sorrow and feare afore them, both being then at the bridge of Barberano ten miles from Vincensa, where all the Captaines and principals of the armie being present, he that was the chiefe of the Embassadours, spake in this sort:

"If it were well knowne how much this Citie of Vincensa (heretofore enuied of many her neighboring Cities for her riches and felicitie) hath suffered, since (more by the error and folly of her inhabitants, and haply more by a certaine fatall disposition, then through any other occasion) she returned vnder the iurisdiction of the Venetians, together with the intollerable harmes and domages she hath receiued: we do certainly beleeue (most inuincible Captaines) that in your hearts would be greater the pitie and compassion of our miseries, then the disdaine and hatred for the memorie of our rebellion; if the error of that night may be called rebellion, wherein our people, drawne into astonishment, for that the armie of our enemie had forced the suburbes of Portello; not to rebell, nor to shun the easie gouernment of Cæsar, but to deliuer our Citie from the sacke and extreme miserie, did send Embassadours to compound with the enemie. Whereunto our peoples, not accustomed to armes, nor acquainted with the dangers of warre, were altogether pushed on by the authoritie of Fracasse, a Captaine experienced in many seuerall wars: who either by subtiltie or feare (a matter not appertaining to vs to examine) gaue vs counsell to prouide by meane of accord, for the safetie of our wiues, of our children, and of our afflicted countrey. The same making manifest, that no ill impression of mind, but onely feare, increased through the authoritie of such a Captaine of Cæsars, was the cause, not that we determined by long counsel, but rather on a sudden, in so great a tumult, & in so fearful a noise of armes & thundring of artilleries, which we haue not bin accustomed to heare, we ran rashly vnder the rule of the Venetians, the felicitie and power of whom was not such, as ought of it selfe to allure vs thereunto. Now it is well knowne to all men what difference there is between faults committed by feare and errour, and offences proceeding of set malice and ill intention. But be it so, that it had not bene feare, but a willingnesse to rebell, and that it had bene begun by an vniuersall counsell and consent, and not in so great confusion, but rather by the vnbridled rashnesse of a few, not being contradicted by the others, and that the transgressions of this wretched Citie were altogether inexcusable; yet our calamities haue bene so great since that accursed reuolt, that we may truly say, that the punishment, without all comparison, hath bene greater then the fault. For, within our wals we haue bene miserably spoiled of all our goods by the garrison souldiers that were left vs: and who knowes not what we haue suffered without, by the continuall warre? And what remaines there entire to vs now in this miserable countrey? All the houses of our possessions are burned, all the trees cut downe, and all our cattell lost. This is the second yeare that we haue bene driuen to reape our harueſt afore the time, that we haue had no securitie to sow our seeds, that we are without reuenue, and without fruites, and without hope that this countrey so generally destroyed, can be euer redressed. We are brought to such a straight, and into so great miserie, that for the needfull supportation of our liues, and to furnish the intollerables charges which our necessities haue brought vpon vs, hauing consumed all that remaineth euen of our hidden treasure, we know not how for the time to come to nourish our selues and our families. Whosoeuer he be that hateth vs most, and is of a most cruell mind (hauing but heretofore seene our country) let him come & see it now: and we are sure he cannot refraine from weeping, when he shal consider that this Citie, the which was wont to be replenished with inhabitants, most sumptuous in magnificence, famous for stately buildings, the ordinarie retraite for all strangers, a Citie reioycing in bankets, iusting and pleasures; is now in a manner voide of dwellers, that the men and women therein are poorely apparelled, that there is not therein any one man who can assure himselfe to be able to feed himselfe and his family for one moneth; and in place of magnificence, feasts and pleasures, there is nothing else seene but penurie, publike sorowing of all the men, weeping and pitifull crying of all the women in euery street and quarter of the Citie. And these calamities (most gracious Prince of Henault) would be yet greater, if we considered not that on your will dependeth either the last desolation of our afflicted country, or the hope that we may yet once again vnder the wings of Cæsar, & vnder the gouernment of your wisedome and clemencie, we say not, take breath and raise our selues againe, for that is impossible, but consuming our liues in all extremitie, auoide at least an extreame and last destruction: a grace which we do the rather hope for, because your benignitie and humanitie is knowne to vs, wherein we doubt not but you will imitate Cæsar, with whose examples of clemencie mencie all Europe is repleniſhed. All our wealth is conſumed, all our hopes determined, there remaineth nothing elſe to vs but our liues and perſons, againſt the which if crueltie ſhould be vſed, what profite would it be for Cæſar, or what praiſe to you? We beſeech you with moſt humble prayers, the which you may imagine to be mingled with the miſerable complaints of euery ſexe, of euery age, and of euery degree that is within this Citie, that it may pleaſe you to make the wretched and vnfortunate Vincenſa an example to all others of the clemencie of the Almaine Empire: that it may pleaſe you to follow the clemencie and magnanimitie of your anceſtors, who being victorious in Italy, preſerued the Cities by them ſubdued, many of them chuſing thoſe ſeates for their proper dwellings, from whence, to the great glory of the Almaine race, are deſcended ſo many noble houſes in Italy, as ſome of Gonſagwo, ſome of Carraro, and others of Eſcalo, who ſometimes were our Lords. Let Vincenſa now ſerue for an example, that the Venetians, aided and ſupported by vs in leſſer dangers, haue cowardly & diſhonorably left vs abandoned in the greateſt perils, wherein they ought to haue defended vs; and that the Almains, who had ſome reaſon to offend vs, haue frankly and glorioufly preſerued vs. Take vs, moſt inuincible Lord Chaumont, into your protection: remember the example of your King, whoſe clemencie to them of Millan and Genes, being drawne into voluntary rebellion, without any cauſe or neceſſitie, was greater then their fault: who after he had pardoned them, being wonne by ſo great fauours, haue alwayes bene moſt affectionate and ſeruiceable vnto him. Oh Prince of Henault, if the preſeruation of Vincenſa turne not to the profite of Cæſar, yet at leaſt it will bring him glorie, remaining as a perpetuall example of his benignitie: but if he deſtroy it, it can bring him no profite; and the ſeueritie which he ſhall vſe to vs, will be grieuous to all Italy. Clemencie will make the name of Cæſar more acceptable to all men; and as in actions of warre and managing of an armie, he is knowne much to reſemble the ancient Cæſar, ſo clemencie ſhal alſo be acknowledged in him, whereby the name of Cæſar was exalted to heauen, and his memory made more perpetuall to all poſterities, then by his armes. Vincenſa a flouriſhing and ancient Citie, which hath heretofore bene full of ſo great Nobilitie, is now at your deuotion: ſhe expecteth frõ you either her preſeruation or deſtruction, her life or her death. Take pitie of ſo many innocent perſons, and ſo many vnfortunate women and poore litle children, who in that lamentable night full of folly and errour, medled with nothing, and now with plaints and wailings expect your deliberation. Send foorth at laſt that ſo much deſired voice of mercie and clemencie, through the which our moſt wretched Citie coming to receiue new life, ſhall alwayes call you her preſeruer and patron.

Neither this ſo pitifull Oration, nor the compaſſion of ſo vnfortunate a Citie, could any whit aſſwage the mind of the Prince of Henault, but being full of pride and crueltie, not hauing ſo much command ouer his paſſions, as to make his words leſſe cruell then his deeds, he made them a moſt churliſh & inhumane anſwer, the which by his commandement was pronounced by his Chancellor in this ſort: Thinke not rebellious Vincentines, that your faire words can ſuffice to wipe out the memory of your faults committed againſt the maieſtie of the name of Cæſar, without any regard to whoſe dignitie, or reſpect to the benignitie wherewith you were receiued by him, you haue by common counſell and conſent of the whole Citie, called into your towne the Venetian armie, who forcing the ſuburbes with great difficultie, diſtruſted to take it, and began to go away. You haue called them in againſt the will of the Prince that repreſented the perſon of Cæſar: you conſtrained that Prince to retire into the Caſtle, and being full of rage and malice, haue ſacked the powder and munitions of Cæſar: you haue torne in peeces his pauillions diſplayed by him in ſo many warres and triumphing in ſo many victories. The Venetian ſouldiers haue not done theſe things, but the people of Vincenſa, diſcouering their violent thirſt after the bloud of the Almaines: and it was not long of you that the Venetian army tooke not Verona, which they had done, if knowing the occaſion, they had followed the victorie: neither did this happen by the counſell or perſwaſion of Fracaſſe, who abuſed by your ſlanders, hath clearely manifeſted his innocencie. It was by your malice; it was by a hatred, which without cauſe you beare to the Almaine name. Your offences are inexcuſable, and ſo great, as they deſerue no pardon. The clemencie that ſhould be vſed to you, would be both hurtfull and infamous, for that it is well knowne you would vpon euery occaſion do yet worſe: and theſe haue not bene your errors, but your wickedneſſe: and the harmes you haue receiued, haue not bene for a puniſhment of your faults, but for that you would obſtinately perſeuere in rebellion: and now being « ing abandoned of the Venetians, you haue no other remedy to defend you, then to implore the « pitie and mercie of Cæsar whom you haue betrayed. The Prince was determined, following the « intention and commission of Cæsar, not to heare you, and yet he hath not denied you audience, « satisfying therein the will of the Lord Chaumont: but for all that he will not change the sentence, « which since the first day of your rebellion hath remained fixed in the mind of Cæsar: he will not « receiue you otherwise, then to discretion for your goods, your honors, & your liues. And hope « not that he will do that to shew you the more clemencie, but the better to make you serue for « an example of punishment to such as accursedly breake their faith to their Prince. The people of Vincensa astonished with this cruell answer, seeming for a while to suffer a generall priuation of all sense and feeling, began againe with teares and lamentable speeches, to recommend them to the mercie of the victor. But being repulsed by the same Doctor, who rebuked them with words more bitter and fierce then the first, they knew not what to answer, nor what to thinke, had it not bene that Monsieur Chaumont encouraged them to obey necessitie, and in giuing themselues wholly vp to the will of the Prince, to seeke to appease his wrath: declaring vn-to them the singular humanitie and curtesie of Cæsar, and that it was not to be suspected, that a Prince of so noble race, and so excellent a Captaine, would do a thing vnworthy of his name and vertue: and that they should not be amazed with the seuere answer that was made, but rather desire that noble and generous spirits should vtter sharpe and biting words, for that oftentimes by that meanes some part of their indignation is abated. He offe-red himselfe to do all that he could to mitigate the mind of the Prince, so far forth as they would preuent him by putting themselues wholly to his discretion. By whose counsell, and the consi-deration of their owne necessitie, the Vincentines falling eftsoones prostrate on the ground, re-ferred absolutely both their honors, liues and Citie to the power of the victor. And then Mon-sieur Chaumont began to solicite for them, declaring to the Prince, that in chastising them he was to respect more the greatnesse and glory of Cæsar, then the qualitie of their offence: That he should not set downe such an example to others that were fallen, or hereafter should fall into the like faults, lest despairing to obtaine mercie, they should become obstinate to the extremitie: That clemencie had alwayes caused Princes to be loued and respected, but crueltie without ne-cessitie, wrought alwayes a contrary effect, nor taking away (as many vndiscreetly beleeue) im-pediments and difficulties, but rather augmenting them and making them greater. By whose authoritie accompanied with the petitions of many others, together with the miserable wailings of the Vincentines, the Prince at last was content to promise them safetie of life, the disposition of all their goods remaining wholly at his will: a bootie greater in opinion then in effect, for that the Citie was left almost desolate both of men and goods: the which as the Almaines sought af-ter with great furie, vnderstanding that many of the towne and countrey were withdrawne with their goods into two caues in a certaine mountaine neare to Vincensa, called the grot of Masano, where by the strength of the place and difficultie to enter, they supposed to find securitie, the Almaines coming thither, after they had in vaine, and not without some harmes, assailed those that were within the great caue, they went to the lesser, and finding that they could not other-wise force it, they made great fires about it, and at last by the benefite of the smoke carried it, with the losse (as the bruite went) of more then a thousand persons.

The Vincen-tines yeild to discretion.

Vincensa being taken, greater difficulties appeared in other things then was expected in the beginning: for that not onely Maximilian did not stirre against the Venetians as he had promi-sed, but also the regiments which he had in Italy diminished continually for want of pay: in so much as Monsieur Chaumont was constrained to stay vpon the guarding of Vincensa; neuerthe-lesse he determined to go incampe before Legnaguo, a towne of such special regard, that if it were not taken, all that had bene done till that day serued to nothing. The riuer of Adice passeth by the towne of Legnaguo, and the lesser part of the same, which they call Porto, is towards Montagna-na, where the Venetians not reposing so much in the strength of the towne and valour of the de-fendants, as in the impediments of the waters, had cut the riuer in one place: and on the other side, where is the greater part of the towne, they had cut it in two places; so as the riuer falling through those trenches, had spread it selfe by many armes into the lowest places, and so couered the countrey about, that standing drowned for many moneths, it was almost become a marrish. But it hapned that the rashnesse and disorder of the Venetian bands, made these difficulties les-ser. For Monsieur Chaumont coming to incamp with his armie at Minerua, three miles from Leg-naguo, nagno, and hauing ſent before certaine of his horſemen and footmen, who as they would haue paſſed the laſt arme of the water, which was within halfe a mile of Legnaguo, they encountred the bands of the footmen which had the guard of Porto, who were iſſued out to ſtop their paſſage. But the Gaſcoines and Spaniards ruſhing reſolutely into the water vp to the breaſt, repulſed them, and purſued them with ſuch valour and fury, that they entred with them pelmell into Porto, very few of the footmen of that place being ſaued, for that ſome were ſlaine in flying, and the greater part of thoſe other that ſought to retire into Legnaguo, were drowned as they would haue paſſed the riuer of Adice. By reaſon of this ſucceſſe Monſieur Chaumont altering his intention to encampe at Minerua, went the ſame night to lodge within Porto: and after he had cauſed to traile vnder the water the great artilleries, which the firme bottome of the earth did ſuſtaine, the ſame night he cauſed the trench of the riuer to be filled vp and ſtopt. And knowing that on that ſide to Porto, Legnaguo was inexpugnable by reaſon of the largeneſſe of the riuer, ſo great, that they could hardly fight on that ſide, (notwithſtanding betweene Legnaguo and Porto, for that it is incompaſſed with hils, it is not ſo large as below) he commanded to prepare a bridge to paſſe the artilleries and ỹ greateſt part of the armie to the other ſide. But finding that the barks which he had cauſed to be brought thither, were not anſwerable to the largeneſſe of the riuer, he incamped himſelfe neare the riuer oppoſite to Legnaguo, and cauſed Captaine Molard with foure thouſand Gaſcoins and ſixe peeces of artilleries to paſſe vpon thoſe barkes to the other ſide of Adice; who being paſſed, they began on both ſides the riuer to batter the baſtillion which was vpon the riſing of a hill at the vpper point of the towne: and part of it being beaten downe, notwithſtanding the defendants vſed all diligence to fortifie it, the night following, the Treaſurer of the Venetian camp, hauing more feare of his enemie then hope or confidence in his owne people, withdrew himſelfe ſuddenly into the Caſtle with certain Venetian Gentlemen. As ſoone as it was day, and their retiring being perceiued, the Captaine of the footmen that guarded the baſtillion rendred it to Molard, their liues and goods ſaued, and yet when he was come out, he and his footmen were ſtripped by the ſouldiers of the campe. The baſtillion being taken, the towne was immediatly put to ſacke by Captaine Molard, and the bands of footmen who guarded another baſtillion made on the other corner of the towne, hauing caſt away their armour, ſought ſafetie by flying through the marriſhes. Thus Legnaguo by the cowardiſe of ſuch as were within it, was more ſuddenly and more eaſily conquered, then was either expected or imagined. Legnaguo taken by Chaumont. The caſtle made no greater reſiſtance then the towne; for, the bulwarkes being beaten downe the day following by the artillery, as they began to vndermine one ſide of a tower with intention afterwards to giue fire to it, they within yeelded themſelues, with condition that the Gentlemen of Venice remaining in the power of Monſieur Chaumont, the ſouldiers ſhould depart without armour. Fortune in this victory mixed ſome of her gall among the felicities of Monſieur Chaumont, for that in that place he had aduertiſement of the death of the Cardinall of Amboiſe his Vnkle, by whoſe great authoritie with the French King, he who had bene raiſed to high promotions and honours, hoped for greater things. Now becauſe the Almaines had not ſufficient ſouldiers to leaue within Legnaguo, Monſieur Chaumont left there in garriſon an hundred Lances and a thouſand footmen, and ſo diſmiſſing the Griſons and Valeſians, he prepared to returne with the reſidue of his armie to the Duchie of Millan, following the commandement of the King, who would no more be at ſo great expences. Of this armie, for that the prouiſions on Ceſars part anſwered not the promiſes that were made, there came no effect of importance. Neuertheleſſe the King commanded him afterward to ſtay yet for the whole moneth of Iune, for that Ceſar being then come to Inſpruch full of difficulties, according to his cuſtome, but full of plots and hopes, made inſtance that he ſhould not depart, promiſing from time to time that he would paſſe into Italy. About which time the Almaines deſiring to recouer Maroſtico, Ciuitella, Baſciano, and other peeces thereabouts, to make the deſcending of Ceſar more eaſie on that ſide, Monſieur Chaumont with his armie incamped at Lungaro vpon the riuer of Baquillon, to the end to ſtop the Venetian companies for entring into Vincenſa, where there was but a very ſmall garriſon, and that they ſhould not oppoſe againſt the Almaines. But being aduertiſed there that the Venetians were retired to Padua, the Almaines ioyning themſelues againe with him, they went to the Torricelli, vpon the high way that leadeth from Vincenſa to Padua, and from thence leauing Padua on the right hand, they marched to Ciuitella with no litle diſcommoditie of victuals, being troubled by the light horſemen that were within Padua, and much more by ſuch as were M. Chaumont incampeth at Lungaro.

at Monſelica. Ciuitella yeelded without reſiſtance, by whoſe example alſo Maroſtico, Baſciano, with other peeces thereabouts, abandoned by the Venetians, did the like. Therefore things being diſpatched on that ſide, the armies returned to the Torricelli, and leauing Padua on the right hand, and turning on the left towards the mountaine, they encamped aboue Brenta neare to the mountaine, within ten miles of Vincenſa: the chiefe reaſon why they went to that place, was, for that the Almaines deſired to occupie Eſcalo, a paſſage very conuenient for the regiments that were to come out of Germanie, and the onely peece that of all other places from Treuiſa to Vincenſa, remained in the hands of the Venetians. From which place the Prince of Henault being departed with his Almaines and an hundred French Lances, he tooke the way of Eſcalo, which was fiue and twentie miles from thence: but he could paſſe no further, for that the countrey people, (full of incredible affection to the Venetians, and ſuch, as being taken priſoners, they choſe rather to die then to denie them, or to ſpeake ill of them) had taken many paſſages in the mountaine: ſo that after he had obtained by compoſition New-caſtle, which is alſo a paſſage of the mountaine, he returned to the incamping place at Brento, hauing ſent by another way many of his footmen towards Eſcalo; who, according to his direction, forſooke the way of Baſciano, to auoide Couolo, which is a ſtrong paſſage in thoſe mountaines, and compaſſing more low by the way of Feltre, they found very few people within Feltre, which they ſacked and burned, and ſo tooke the way to Eſcalo, which, with Couolo, they found abandoned. About that time alſo the ruines were nothing leſſe in the countrey of Friul, for that being ſometimes aſſailed by the Venetians, and ſometimes inuaded by the Almaines, now defended and eſtſoones pillaged by the Gentlemen of the countrey, and whileſt the one aduanced and the other gaue backe, as occaſion ſerued, there was ſeene in euery place nothing more then dead carkaſſes of men, townes ſacked, and fortreſſes burned: and it hapned oftentimes that the ſame places which had bene firſt ſacked by one partie, were ſhortly after ſacked and burned by the other; and except certaine ſtrong peeces, all the reſidue of the countrey was expoſed to this miſerable deſtruction. But becauſe in thoſe actions there was nothing done worthy of memory, it would be no leſſe ſuperfluous to recount the particulars, then troubleſome to vnderſtand ſo many variable reuolutions, which brought forth no effect importing the ſubſtance of the ware.

Conuention between Cæſar and the French king.

But now the time approching that the French armie ſhould depart, there was made this new conuention between Cæſar and the French King, that his armie ſhould yet continue for the moneth following, with couenant that the extraordinary expences, ſuch as ran ouer and aboue the payes of the bands which the King had defrayed till that time, ſhould be payed hereafter by Cæſar, together with the regiments of the footmen for that moneth. But becauſe Cæſar was not then prouided of money, that the ſumme ſhould be ſet downe of thoſe expences, and the King to make it vp by way of loane to the ſumme of fiftie thouſand duckats: which if Cæſar did not repay within one yeare following, together with the other fiftie thouſand which were lent him before, the King ſhould take into his hands Verona with all the territories, till he were ſatisfied. Monſieur Chaumont hauing receiued the Kings commandement to follow ſtill thoſe warres, turned all his wits and deuices to take Monſelica, and therefore as ſoone as foure hundred Spaniſh Lances led by the Duke of Terminy were arriued, who, being ſent by the King Catholike to the ſuccours of Maximilian, had according to their cuſtome marched very ſlowly; the armies after they had paſſed the riuer of Brento, and afterwards the riuer of Baquillon at the village of Purlo, within fiue miles of Padua, arriued at Monſelica, not without great ſcarcitie of victuals and forrages, by reaſon of the incurſions of the horſemen that were within Padua and Monſelica, who beſides this tooke Sonzin Benzone of Crema, a Captaine for the French King, being gone with a very ſlender ſtrength of horſemen to view the ſcouts: and, for that he was the author of the rebellion of Crema, Andrew Gritti reſpecting more that he was a ſubiect to the Venetians, then a ſouldier of the enemies, cauſed him to be hanged preſently. In the towne of Monſelica which ſtandeth in the plaine, is a riſing as it were a ſtonie hill (by reaſon whereof it is called Monſelica) which is very high, on the top whereof is a Caſtle, and at the back of that hil which goeth always leſſening, there be three circuits of wals, the loweſt whereof comprehended ſo much ſpace, that it well needeth two thouſand men to defend it againſt a whole armie. The enemies abandoned ſuddenly the towne, wherein the French being beſtowed, they planted their artillery againſt the firſt circuite, and after they had well battered it in many places, the footmen of the Gaſcoins and Spaniards began to approch the wall in diſorder, ſtriuing to enter by many breaches. There were

within for the defence of it ſeuen hundred men, who ſuppoſing it had bene an aſſault appointed and ordered, and ſeeing their diſabilitie to make reſiſtance if the aſſault were giuen in ſundry places, after they had made a ſmall defence, began to retire according to an agreement made amongſt themſelues before (as was beleeued:) but they made their retrait in ſuch diſorder, that the enemie who had already begun to enter the firſt circuit, purſuing them with light skirmiſh to the top of the hill, entred pelmell with them the other circuits, and ſo to the caſtle: where the greateſt part of them that were in garriſon being ſlain, the reſidue which were withdrawne to the tower, offering to yeeld vpon ſuretie of life, were not accepted by the Almaines, who at laſt put fire to the tower: ſo as of ſeuen hundred footmen and fiue Centurions, whereof Martin de Bourg of Tuſcane was the principall, there were very few ſaued, euery one hauing leſſe compaſſion of their calamities, for the cowardiſe they had ſhewed. And the Almaines ſhewed no leſſe crueltie againſt the buildings and walls; for not hauing ſufficient companies to guard them, they did not onely diſmantle the fortreſſe of Monſelica, but alſo conſumed the towne with fire: after which day thoſe armies did nothing of importance, ſauing that foure hundred French Lances ran vp euen to the gates of Padua. About this time the Duke of Ferrara departed from the campe, and Monſieur Chaſtillon with him, whom Monſieur Chaumont ſent with two hundred and fiftie Lances for the guard of Ferrara, where the people liued in great ſuſpition, for that the bands of the Pope were not farre from thence: notwithſtanding the Almaines perſwaded much Monſieur Chaumont (according to the agreement formerly made betweene them) to go incampe before Treuiſa, alledging that the actions which had bene done with ſo great expences, were of litle importance, if Treuiſa were not taken: for, touching Padua, there was no hope to be able to haue it. But on the contrary, Monſieur Chaumont replied, that Caſar was not deſcended againſt the Venetians with ſuch forces as he had promiſed: and that thoſe that were ioyned to his army, were reduced to a very ſmall number: that within Treuiſa, where the Venetians had made very great fortifications, there were ſtore of ſouldiers: that the ſtore of victuals was worne out of the countrey, and that it was very difficult to bring prouiſion to the campe from farre places, for the continuall vexation of the light horſemen and eſtradiots of the Venetians, who being aduertiſed by the diligent eſpiall of the countrymen of euery litle mouing that was made, and being beſides in great number, ſhewed themſelues alwayes in euery place where they might endomage them. Theſe diſputations ceaſſed, by reaſon of a new commandement that came from the French King to Monſieur Chaumont, that leauing in the army of the Almaines foure hundred Lances and fifteene hundred Spaniſh footmen of the Kings pay, beſides thoſe that were in garriſon in Legnaguo, he ſhould ſuddenly returne with his army to the Duchie of Millan: for that many great troubles and dangers began already to appeare, whereof the Pope was the cauſe. By reaſon whereof Monſieur Chaumont leauing the gouernment of thoſe companies to Monſieur Perſi, he followed the Kings commandement; and the Almaines diſtruſting to be able to do any thing more of importance, put themſelues into Loniguo.

The Popes deliberation to chaſe the French out of Italy.

The Pope had of long time ſet downe in his mind an obſtinate reſolution, not onely to repoſſeſſe the Church of many Eſtates, which he pretended to appertaine to him, but alſo to chaſe the French King out of all that he held in Italy: and that which induced him thereunto, was either a ſecret and ancient ill will that he bare him, or a iealouſie which he had nouriſhed a long time, and now was conuerted into extreame hatred: or elſe a deſire of glorie, to be the deliuerer (as he boaſted afterwards) of Italy from forreine nations. To theſe ends he had abſolued the Venetians of the Church cenſures: to theſe ends, he was entred into intelligence and ſtraight alliance with the Swiſſers, making ſemblance to proceed in theſe things, more for his proper ſuretie, then for deſire to offend another: and to theſe ends, not being able to withdraw the Duke of Ferrara from the deuotion of the French King, he was determined to do all that he could to occupie that Duchie, giuing it out that he ſtirred onely for the quarrell of ſalt and tribute. And yet to the end not fully to diſcloſe his thoughts vntill he were better prepared, he dealt continually with Albert Pio, to haue agreement with the French King; who perſwading himſelfe that all his diſcontentment came for that he had taken the Duke of Ferrara into his protection, and being very deſirous to auoide his ill will, he conſented to contract with him new couenants, referring himſelfe to the capitulations of Cambray, wherein was expreſſed, that none of the Confederates ſhould intrude vpon any thing appertaining to the Church, inſerting therein ſuch words and clauſes as might make it lawfull to the Pope to proceed againſt the Duke of Ferrara, ſo far forth as concerned the particularitie of the tribute and ſalt, to which ends the King ſuppoſed the Popes thoughts did chiefly tend: interpreting the protection which he had taken of the Duke of Ferrara, as though there was left to him a lawfull libertie to contract with the Pope in that maner. But the nearer the King approched to the demands of the Pope, the further was he eſtranged and ſeparate from him, being nothing moued for the newes he heard of the death of the Cardinall of Amboiſe. For, to ſuch as perſwaded him to the peace, and tooke their argument vpon this, that his ſuſpitions were now finiſhed, he anſwered, that the ſame King liued, and therefore the ſame iealouſies continued; alledging for confirmation of that ſaying, that it was well knowne, that the accord made by the Cardinall of Pauie had bene violated by the Kings owne determination, contrary to the will and counſell of the Cardinall of Amboiſe. Yea ſuch as looked more deeply into the Popes proceedings, found that his ſtomacke and his hopes were ſo much the more increaſed, and not without cauſe; for the qualities of the King being ſuch, as he ſtood in more need to be gouerned, then he was fit to gouerne, doubtleſſe he was much weakned by the death of the Cardinall of Amboiſe, ſince that beſides his long experience, his abilitie of wit was great, and had ſuch grace and authoritie with the King, that he almoſt alwayes followed his counſell, whereby it came to paſſe, that truſting to his greatneſſe, he would oftentimes take vpon him of himſelfe to giue a forme and reſolution of affaires: a matter which was not found in ſuch as ſucceeded him in the gouernment, who durſt not ſpeake to the King of ſuch things as they thought would diſpleaſe him, much leſſe could they determine: beſides, he repoſed not ſuch confidence in their counſels, and being many in number, reſpecting one another, and as yet not greatly truſting in their new authoritie, they proceeded more coldly and more careleſſy then either the importance of the preſent affaires required, or was neceſſary againſt the heate and importunitie of the Pope: who not accepting any of the offers made by the King, required him at laſt to renounce, not with condition and limitation, but abſolutely and ſimply, the protection which he had taken of the Duke of Ferrara. And the King labouring to perſwade him, that ſuch a renunciation would bring him great infamie, he anſwered in the end, that ſeeing the King refuſed to renounce ſimply, he would neither contract with him, nor be againſt him; and that not binding himſelfe to any perſon, he would ſtudie to maintaine the ſtate of the Church in peace, complaining more then euer of the Duke of Ferrara: who, his friends counſelling him to giue ouer the making of ſalt, had made this anſwer, that he could not follow their aduice without preiudicing the rights of the Empire, whereunto the iuriſdiction of Comachio did directly appertaine. But beſides this, many entred into a certaine doubt and opinion, which tooke increaſing with time, that Albert Pio the French Kings Embaſſadour, not proceeding ſincerely in his legation, ſtirred vp the Pope againſt the Duke of Ferrara, for a burning deſire he had (wherein he continued till his death) that Alphonſo ſhould be depriued of the Dukedome of Ferrara. The reaſon was, for that Hercules, father of Alphonſo, hauing had certaine yeares afore of Gilbert Pio the moitie of the dominion of Carpy, giuing him in recompence the borough of Saſſuola with certaine other lands, Albert feared (as oftentimes it falls out, that the weakeſt is compelled to yeeld to the will of the ſtronger) that in the end the other moitie either by compulſion or corruption would deuolue to him. But whatſoeuer the truth was, the Pope ſhewing ſignes of a perſon vnreconcileable againſt Alphonſo, and hauing alreadie determined to make warre againſt him, he prepared to proceed againſt him with the cenſures of the Church, ſeeking to iuſtifie the grounds of this action; and ſpecially by giuing out ẏ he had found among the Records of the Chamber Apoſtolik, the inueſtiture of the towne of Comachio, giuen by ẏ Popes to the houſe of Eſte. Theſe were the publike behauiours of the Pope, but in ſecret he ſolicited to ſet abroach farre greater troubles, ſuppoſing that he had layed a good foundation to his affaires, in contracting amitie with the Swiſſers, and hauing the Venetians at his deuotion: and withall that he ſaw the King of Aragon had the ſame end with him, or at leaſt was not ſoundly ioyned with the French King: that the forces and authoritie of Cæſar were ſo weake, that he had no need to feare him: and laſtly, that he was not without hope to procure the King of England to ſtirre. But that which ſhould moſt haue appeaſed him, did moſt ſtirre vp his ſpirits, which was the knowledge he had that the French King hauing no diſpoſition to make warre againſt the Church, nouriſhed a ſetled deſire to haue peace: inſomuch as it ſeemed to him that it would alwayes remaine in his power to draw him to peace, yea though he had leuied armes againſt him. For which reaſons growing dayly more inſolent, and redoubling openly

his complaints and threats againſt the French king and the Duke of Ferrara, he refuſed in the feaſt of the celebration of S. Peter (a day wherein, according to ancient cuſtome, are offered the tributes which are due to the ſea Apoſtolike) to accept the tribute of the Duke of Ferrara; ſaying, that the grant of Alexander the ſixt, who in marrying his daughter, had from foure thouſand duckets, reduced that offering to an hundred yearely, was of no force, becauſe it was to the preiudice of his Sea: beſides, he would not afore this time giue licence to the Cardinall of Achx and other French Cardinals to returne into France; and vnderſtanding that the Cardinall of Achx was gone to take the pleaſure of the fields with certain grayhounds, he entred into a vaine ſuſpition that he would ſecretly ſtart away, and therfore ſent ſpeedily after to take him, and held him priſoner in the caſtle S. Ange. Thus diſcloſing himſelfe now openly againſt the French king, and for that cauſe ſeeing himſelfe ſo much the more conſtrained to lay the greater foundations, he granted to the King Catholike the inueſtiture of the kingdome of Naples, vnder condition of the ſame tribute with the which the Kings of Aragon had obtained it, notwithſtanding he had refuſed afore to beſtow it otherwiſe then for fortie thouſand duckats: a rate afore time impoſed vpon the French king when he obtained it. That which moued the Pope hereunto, was not ſo much the bond which in other inueſtitures of the ſame kingdome, was wont to be made to him to entertaine euery yeare for him three hundred men at armes for the defence of the Church, as often as need required, as the deſire he had to make him his friend, and the hope that his aides (vpon occaſion) might do much to leade him into an open contention with the French King: whereof were already diſcerned certaine ſeeds and beginnings, for that the King Catholike ſuſpecting much the greatneſſe of the French King, and no leſſe iealous of his ambition, for that not content with the limits of the league of Cambray, he ſought to draw Verona to his obedience; and beſides all this, being puſhed on by the memory of ancient quarrels, he deſired greatly that there might be found ſome impediment in his affaires; and therefore ceaſſed not to counſell a peace betweene Ceſar and the Venetians, which was not a litle deſired by the Pope: and albeit he proceeded very ſecretly in theſe actiõs, yet he was not able altogether to couer his thoughts; inſomuch as his armie by ſea being fallen vpon Sicile, which he ſent to aſſaile the Ile of Gerbes (an Iland anciently called by the Latines the great Sirta) the King was entred into ſuſpition, and the minds of men that were well acquainted with his ſubtilties, were occupied with many doubts.

But troubles begã to ariſe to the French king frõ thoſe parts which he doubted leaſt, & in a time wherein he had no expectation of any mouing of armes to be prepared againſt him. For the Pope working alwayes vnder hand, ſolicitèd that at one time Genes might be aſſailed both by ſea and land: that twelue thouſand Swiſſers might deſcend vpon the Duchie of Millan: that the Venetians aſſembling all their forces, ſhould take the field to recouer their townes holden by Ceſar: and that his owne armie ſhould enter vpon the country of Ferrara, with intention to paſſe afterward into the Duchie of Millan, if things began to ſucceed happily to the Swiſſers. And he hoped that Genes being aſſailed vpon the ſudden, there would eaſily ariſe ſome mutation, for that there were many that bare no ſound affection to the gouernment of the French, and for that the faction of Fregoſa would riſe into mutinie, going thither vnder colour to make Octauian Duke, whoſe father and vnkle had poſſeſſed the ſame dignitie: that the French men amazed for the commotion of Genes, and being inuaded by the Swiſſers, would reuoke to the Duchie of Millan all the bands which they had with Ceſar and the Duke of Ferrara, which would be a cauſe that the Venetians ſhould eaſily recouer Verona, and afterwards ſet vpon the Duchie of Millan: that his regiments ſhould do the like after they had (as he hoped) made an eaſie conqueſt of Ferrara, being abandoned of the French; ſo that the eſtate of Millan could not defend it ſelfe againſt ſo many enemies, and ſo ſudden a warre. He began at one time the warre againſt Ferrara and againſt Genes: for albeit the Duke of Ferrara (againſt whom he proceeded, the more to haſten the execution, as againſt a notorious offender) offered to giue him the ſalts that were made at Comachio, with obligation that hereafter there ſhould be no more made; yet after he had diſmiſſed his Embaſſadours, he cauſed his armie to march againſt him, which with the onely ſummons of a trumpet, and no defence appearing, obtained Cente and Pieua, the which boroughs appertaining formerly to the Biſhopricke of Bologna, Pope Alexander in marrying his daughter, had annexed them to the Duchie of Ferrara, recompencing that Biſhopricke with other reuenues. Againſt Genes were ſent eleuen galleys of the Venetians, guided by Grillo Contarin, and one of the Popes, carrying Octauian Fregoſa, Ieronymo Dorea, with many other of the baniſhed men: and by land at the ſame time, and for the ſame expedition, was diſpatched Marke Anthonie Colonno with an hundred men at armes, and ſeuen hundred footmen: this Captaine hauing left the pay of the Florentines, and being entertained by the Pope, abode vpon the territories of Lucques vnder colour to furniſh his band, giuing out a bruite that he was afterwards to go to Bolognia: and albeit Monſieur Chaumont entred into ſome ſuſpition of Genes by reaſon of his abiding, yet not knowing that the army by ſea was to come, and the Pope hauing ſubtilly ſpread a bruite, that the preparations of the Swiſſers, and the lingring of Marke Anthonie were to execute ſome ſurpriſe vpon Ferrara, he made no other prouiſion for Genes, then to ſend thither a few footmen. Marke Anthonie with his companies marched to the vale of Biſagna, within a mile of the walls of Genes, although he was not receiued (according to the Popes hopes) either into Serezana or into the towne of Spetia: and at the ſame time the armie by ſea which had occupied Seſtria and Chiauera, was come from Rapale to the mouth of the riuer Entelle, which falleth into the ſea neare the port of Genes: into which Citie, vpon the firſt bruite that the enemies approched, there was entred for the French King the ſonnes of Iohn Lewis de Fieſquo with eight hundred men of the countrey, with whom was ioyned the Cardinals nephew of Finalo, with an equall proportion of ſouldiers, which both aſſured the towne, and kept ſuppreſſed all commotions. By meanes whereof the Pope and the exiles being deceiued of their principall hope, ſeeing beſides a continuall flocking of ſouldiers out of Lombardie and the riuer of Ponant, together with ſixe great Galleys entring the hauen guided by Preian, they thought that to tarry longer there, would bring more perill then profite: and therefore both the nauie by ſea and the armie by land returned to Rapale, and in returning aſſayed to take Portoſino, where died Franciſco Bolani, a patron of one of the Venetian galleys. And from thence their armie by ſea hoiſſing ſaile to go to Ciuitauecchia, Marke Anthonie Colonno doubting he could not paſſe ſafely by land for the commotions of the countrymen and popular fury alwayes raging againſt ſouldiers that retire in diſfauour, imbarked himſelfe in the galleys with threeſcore of the beſt horſemen, ſending the reſidue by land to Spetia, the moſt part of whom were ſtript, as well vpon the countrey of Genes, as vpon the marches of Lucques, and the frontiers of the Florentines. This attempt was done with very ſmall honour to Grillo and Octauian, for that for feare they abſtained to charge the veſſels of Preian, who being inferiour, it was ſuppoſed that before he entred the hauen, they might haue ſet vpon him with a great aduantage. After they were gone, Preian iſſued out of the hauen with ſeuen galleys and foure ſhips, and followed the Venetian nauie which was ſtronger then he in galleys, but weaker in number of ſhips. Both the one and other fell with the Ile of Elba, the Venetians in the port of Lungono, and the French in the hauen of Ferrato, who after they had accoaſted the enemie to the mount Argentaro, returned againe to Genes. About this time the Popes ſouldiers were entred into Romagna vnder the Duke of Vrbin, againſt the Duke of Ferrara; where hauing taken the towne of Lugo, Bagnacaual, and all the reſidue that the Duke held on this ſide Po, they encamped before the Caſtle of Lugo: and whileſt they lay there, without vſing diligence, and in no good order, being aduertiſed that the Duke of Ferrara with the French bands, and an hundred and fiftie men at armes of his owne, with many troupes of light horſemen, was marching to the reſcue of it, the Duke of Vrbin raiſed the ſiege ſuddenly, leauing three peeces of artillery in prey to the enemie, & retired to Imola. Alphonſo taking the aduantage of this occaſion, recouerd all that they had taken from him in Romagna: but the campe Eccleſiaſtike being againe aſſembled and increaſed, reconquered eftſoones the ſelfe ſame places eaſily, and immediatly after forced the caſtle of Lugo, hauing battred it many dayes: and after the taking of it, an occaſion of greater ſucceſſe preſented it ſelfe vnto them. For there being no garriſon in Modena, for that the Duke being buſied about the defending of other places where the danger was neareſt, could not prouide of himſelfe, nor obtaine of Monſieur Chaumont to ſend thither two hundred Lances, the Cardinall of Pauie paſſing with the army to Frankcaſtle, obtained that Citie preſently by compoſition, whither he was inuited to come by Gerard and Francis Maria Rangons Gentlemen of Modena, whoſe authoritie was ſo great (chiefly Gerard) that they were able to diſpoſe of it as beſt liked them: and it was beleeued, that they were puſhed on more by ambition and deſire of innouation, then by any other occaſion. Modena being loſt, the Duke fearing leſt the like would happen to Regge, beſtowed preſent garriſon there, and Monſieur Chaumont doing after the hurt receiued, that which would haue profited more in the beginning, ſent thither two hundred Lances, notwithſtanding he had many impediments for the deſcending ſcending of the Swiſſers. The confederation betweene the French King and the Swiſſers, was determined many moneths before, the King continuing in his reſolution not to augment their penſions, contrary to the counſell of all his Nobles, who aduiſed him to conſider of what importance it would be, to make thoſe armies his enemies, with the which he had before danted all men. And therefore they being already drawne into armes vnder the authoritie and promiſes of the Pope, and incited by the Biſhop of Sion, but ſpecially made angry with the Kings obſtinacie in denying their demands, were reſolued by an vniuerſall conſent of the Communalties in an aſſembly holden at Lucerna, to make warre againſt him. But Monſieur Chaumont foreſeeing theſe ſtirres, had ſet good guard vpon the paſſages towards Coma, and taken from the riuers all the boates and barks, and withdrawne into places of ſtrength all victuals and prouiſions, and laſtly had taken from the mils their grinding inſtruments. And being vncertaine, whether the Swiſſers would deſcend vpon the Duchie of Millan, or paſſing the mount S. Bernard, enter into Piemont by the vale of Auguſto, go to Sauona, with intention to domage Genes, or elſe paſſing the Appenin, to go againſt the Duke of Ferrara; he had induced the Duke of Sauoy to deny them paſſage; and for their more impediment, he ſent with his conſent fiue hundred Lances to Turea, not ceaſſing neuertheleſſe in the meane while to do all that he could to corrupt with preſents and promiſes the chiefe Commanders of that Nation, to withdraw them from riſing. But it was in vaine, ſo great was their hatred, and ſo much were they incenſed (chiefly the commons) againſt the French king: in ſo much as eſteeming it to be their proper cauſe, notwithſtanding the difficulties that were in the Pope to ſend them money, for that the Fookers bankers of Germanie, who had promiſed to defray it for him, ſhrunke backe for feare to offend Ceſar, ſixe thouſand of them leuied by the Pope began to march in the beginning of September: amongſt whom were foure hundred horſemen, halfe of them armed with ſhot, fifteene hundred footmen with caliuers, and fiftie harquebuſiers, without artillerie or other prouiſion of bridges or boates: who turning to the way of Belinſona, and hauing taken the bridge of Treſa, left abandoned by ſixe hundred French footmen which were there in garriſon, they incamped at Vareſa, expecting there (as they ſaid) the Biſhop of Sion with new companies. This troubled much the minds of the French, both for an ordinary feare they had of the Swiſſers, and more particularly for that at that time they had a very ſmall number of men at armes in Millan, part of them being diſtributed for the guard of Breſſa, Legnaguo, Valegge, & Peſquiero, and three hundred Lances being gone to the ſuccours of the Duke of Ferrara, and fiue hundred being ioyned with the armie of the Almaines againſt the Venetians. Yet neuertheleſſe Monſieur Chaumont aſſembling his forces, came with fiue hundred Lances and foure thouſand footmen into the plaine of Chaſtillon within two miles of Vareſa, hauing ſent John Iaques Triuulce to the mount of Brianſa, to the end that not ſo much with the bands which he brought with him, which were in very ſmall number, as with the fauour of the men of the countrey, he might endeuour to keepe the Swiſſers from taking that way: who as ſoone as they were arriued at Vareſa, ſent to demand paſſage of Monſieur Chaumont, ſaying they would go to the ſeruice of the Church: by reaſon whereof it was doubted they would paſſe to Ferrara by the Duchie of Millan, by which way (beſides the impediments of the French companies) they ſhould haue found difficultie to haue paſſed the riuers of Po and Oglia: or elſe taking the left hand, would turne by the hils below Coma and Lucques, to paſſe the riuer of Adda, which there is narrow and not rough, from whence they might be guided by the hill of the countrey of Bergamo and Breſſia to the riuer of Oglia: and hauing paſſed ouer there, they might deſcend either by the countrey of Breſſia or by Guiaradadda vpon the marches of Mantua, which is a countrey large, where there are neither townes nor forces to reſiſt them. Such was the valour of that nation, and the reputation of their militarie diſcipline, that Monſieur Chaumont had no intention to ſet vpon them, by any meanes, no although they ſhould deſcend into the plaines, but with his horſmen & footmen ioyned together, and with his field peeces, to accoaſt and houer vpon them to cut off their victuals, and to giue them as many impediments as he could to paſſe the riuers (without tempting fortune): and in the meane while from thoſe places neare Vareſa that were well furniſhed with horſemen and footmen, he giuing them oftentimes falſe alarums, keeping them in breath all the night. At Vareſa, where the Swiſſers were now in great want of victuals, a new ſupply of foure thouſand came and ioyned with them, and the fourth day after their coming, they marched all together towards Chaſtillon, keeping vpon the left hand along the hils, marching alwayes in cloſe ranke, in good order, and without making any haſte. They were in euery file foure ſcore or an hundred, and in the laſt files were all the harquebuſiers and caliuers; and marching in this ſort, they defended themſelues valiantly againſt the French army, which alwayes accoaſted them, and skirmiſhed with them both behind and before; yea ſometimes an hundred or an hundred and fiftie of them would iſſue out of their ſquadron, to entertaine skirmiſh, aduancing, ſtaying, and retiring in ſuch ſort, as there could be diſcerned no diſorder in their doings. In this ſort they arriued the firſt day at the paſſage of the bridge of Vedan, which was guarded by Captaine Molard with certaine Gaſcoines, who being driuen backe with the ſhot of their harquebuſes, they lodged the ſame night at Appiana, eight miles from Vareſa, and Monſieur Chaumont encamped within Aſſaron, which is a great village towards the hill of Brianſa ſixe miles from Appiana. The day following, they drew along the hils, towards Cantu, Monſieur Chaumont accoaſting them alwayes with two hundred Lances, for that by reaſon of the roughneſſe of the places, the artilleries remained more lower together with the footmen that guarded them: and yet in the mid way either for the domages which the French had giuen them that day, as Monſieur Chaumont boaſted, or for that ſuch was their reſolution, leauing the way of Cantu, and turning more on the left hand, they went retiring by the high places towards Coma, encamping for that night in a ſuburbe of that Citie, and in the villages thereabout. From the ſuburbe of Coma, they made another lodging at Chiaſſo three miles more forward, keeping the French men in doubt, whether they would returne to Belinſona by the valley of Lungaro, or draw towards the riuer of Adda; where, albeit they were not furniſhed with bridges, yet many ſuppoſed that hauing made a bridge of boates, they would aſſay to paſſe all at once. But the next day putting them out of this doubt, they went and harboured at the bridge of Treſa, and from thence retired by troupes into their houſes, being reduced into the vttermoſt extremitie of victuals and want of money. It was beleeued that this ſo ſudden retrait was done for want of money, and for the difficulties to paſſe the riuers, but much more for the neceſſitie of victuals. In this ſort the French men were deliuered for this time, of a danger which they eſteemed not litle, although the King making his matters greater then they were indeed, affirmed that he could not but hold it profitable for his affaires to ſuffer them to paſſe, making this queſtion, whether of theſe two things would make the Pope more weake, either to be without ſouldiers, or to haue an armie that came to offend him, as did the Swiſſers, whom, with ſo many forces and ſo much treaſure, he had had all the paine in the world to manage.

The perill of the French had yet bene farre greater, if at one time they had bene aſſailed in many places, according to the purpoſe of the Pope: but as the enterpriſe of Genes was afore the mouing of the Swiſſers, ſo the armie of the Venetians aduanced not ſo ſoone as was determined, notwithſtanding they had had a ſingular occaſion and commoditie, for that the Almaine bands within Vincenſa, with whom were the Spaniſh footmen, and the fiue hundred French Lances, being much diminiſhed ſince the departure of Monſieur Chaumont, the Venetian armie iſſuing out of Padua, recouered without great trauell Eſte, Monſelica, Montagnana, Maroſtico, and Baſciana: and paſſing further, the Almaines alwayes drawing towards Verona, they entred into Vincenſa which they had abandoned: and ſo hauing recouered all thoſe peeces, except Legnaguo, which with ſo great expences and trauell of the French men, they had loſt in the whole Sommer; they came to S. Martin fiue miles from Verona, into which Citie the enemies retired, whoſe retraite had not bene without danger, if (as the Venetians ſay) there had bene greater courage in Luke Maluezzo; who was then their Generall, for that Iohn Paul Baillon had left their pay. For, the Venetians being come to the village of Towre, the enemies leauing great ſtore of victuals in their lodgings, tooke the way to Verona, the whole Venetian armie following them, and the light horſemen continually annoying them: and yet the French ſuſtaining valiantly the reareguard, chiefly with the artillery, they paſſed the riuer of Arpan, and marched without danger to Newtowne, the Venetians incamping within halfe a mile of them: and the day after, the Venetians not following them carefully, by reaſon, as they ſaid, their footmen were not able to follow the horſemen, they retired ſafely into Verona. The Venetians ſtayed certaine dayes at S. Martin, and then approching neare Verona, not without blame, for the vnprofitable ſtay they had made, they began to employ their artilleries (which they had planted vpon the oppoſite mountaine) againſt the Caſtle of S. Felix and the next wall: and haply they made choiſe of that place for that it was difficult to be fortified, and for that the horſemen could not ſtirre but very incommodiouſly:

diouſly. The Venetian army contained eight hundred men at armes, three thouſand light horſemen, the moſt part eſtradiots, and ten thouſand footmen, beſides a great quantitie of paiſants: and within Verona were three hundred Spaniſh Lances, one hundred Lances of Almaines and Italians, and more then foure hundred French Lances, fiue hundred footmen payed by the King, and foure thouſand Almaines, no longer vnder the Prince of Henault, who was dead certaine dayes afore. The people of Verona being ill affected to the Almaines, were vp with their weapons in their hands; a matter wherein the Venetians had much hoped, whoſe light horſemen paſſing at the ſame time the riuer of Adice at a foord beneath Verona, ouerranne the whole countrey. The artilleries of the Venetians battered the wall with great fury; notwithſtanding the artillery planted within by the French, and couered with their defences, did greatly diſtreſſe thoſe that were without, who had no rampiers: Lactantius Bergame, a Colonell of the greateſt account with the Venetians, had his buttocks ſtriken away with a ſhot of the artillery, of which he died within few dayes after. At laſt the artillery without hauing done a wonderfull execution, and beaten downe a great part of the wall, euen to the beginning of the ſcarpe, and ſo diſmounted and broken their Cannons that the artillery within was of litle or no ſeruice, the Almaines were not without feare to loſe the Caſtle, notwithſtanding it was well rampierd: to the loſſe whereof, to the end the loſing of the Citie ſhould not be ioyned, they determined in caſe of neceſſitie to retire to certaine rampiers which they had made in a place neare, to beate vpon the ſudden with their Cannons, which they had already planted, the face of the inner part of the Caſtle, hoping to make ſuch an opening, that the enemies ſhould find ſmall ſafetie to tarry there. But the valour of thoſe that were within, was farre aboue the vertue of the other; for that in the Venetian army were no other footmen then Italians, who being ordinarily payed euery fortie dayes, followed that ſeruice, more for that they found in other places very ſlender preferment, then for any other reaſon. Beſides, the Italian footmen, not accuſtomed to the order of ſeruice beyond the Mounts, nor reſolute in the field, were at that time almoſt alwayes reiected of euery one that had meanes to furniſh their ſeruice with footmen ſtrangers, ſpecially with Swiſſers, Almains and Spaniards. Therefore the towne being defended with a greater valour then it was aſſaulted, there iſſued out one night about eighteene hundred footmen, with certaine French horſemen to charge the artillery; and the footmen that guarded it being eaſily put to flight, they choaked two great peeces, ſtriuing to draw them into the towne: but the alarum being ſuddenly raiſed through all the campe, Ettolo de Perouſa came to the reſcue with many footmen, who fighting valiantly, finiſhed his life with great glorie. And Denis de Naldo coming on with the greater part of the army, the enemie was compelled to leaue the artillery and retire; yet with great praiſe, ſith that in the beginning they brake the guard that defended the artillery, and after ſlue part of ſuch as came firſt to the reſcue: and laſtly, retired almoſt all in ſafetie. In the end the Venetian Captaines being diſcouraged by this accident, ſeeing the inhabitants made no mutinie, and iudging withall, that their abiding there would be no leſſe vnprofitable then full of perill, for the ill ſuretie of their campe (their footmen being lodged in the mountaine, and their horſemen in the valley very farre from the footmen) they determined to retire to their old lodging at S. Martin, wherein they made the more ſpeed, for that they vnderſtood that Monſieur Chaumont would come to the reſcue of the towne, hauing already auoided the perill of the Swiſſers. When the campe brake vp, the forragers of Verona accompanied with a great ſtrength, entred the valley of Poliento ioyning to the mountaine of S. Felix: but many light horſemen of the Venetians being ſent out for reſcue, and ſeizing firſt of the entry of the valley, put them all to the ſword, or to the fortune of priſoners. From S. Martin the Venetian army drew to S. Boniface, being fearfull of the comming of Monſieur Chaumont: at which time thoſe that were in garriſon within Treuiſa, tooke by compoſition the towne of Aſola neare the riuer Muſono, wherein were eight hundred Almaine footmen: and afterwards the Caſtle. And in Friul they proceeded with the ſame variations and accuſtomed cruelties, no more making warre vpon the enemies, but proſecuting on all parts the deſtruction of buildings, and the ſpoiling of the countrey: which calamities likewiſe conſumed Iſtria. About this time it came to paſſe that the Marquis of Mantua was deliuered out of priſon after a very memorable maner, procured by the Pope, whereunto he was induced by an ancient affection which he bare to him before, and by a deſire to ſerue his turne of him, and the commoditie of his eſtate in the warre againſt the French King: and it was beleeued through all Italy, that he had bene the worker of his deliuery: but I haue bene informed by

The calamities of Friul and Iſtria.

The Marquis of Mantua eſcapeth out of priſon.

by an author worthy of credite, and through whose hands at that time passed the whole gouernment of the estate of Mantua, that his libertie was wrought by another meane: for that he doubting lest the Venetians (as the truth was) either for the hate they bare him, or for the suspition they had of him, would keepe him perpetuall prisoner; after there had bene vsed in vaine many trials and remedies, it was determined in the Councell of Mantua, to haue recourse to Baiazet Prince of the Turks, whose amitie the Marquis had entertained many yeares, by sending him messages with sundry presents; who, taking knowledge of his calamitie, sent for the Gouernour of the Venetian Merchants lying at Pera in Constantinople, and told him, he must promise him that the Marquis should be deliuered: and the Gouernour refusing to promise that which was not in his power to performe, offered to write to Venice, where he doubted not but there would be set downe a resolution conformable to his desire; but Baiazet replying proudly, that it was his will that he should make an absolute promise, he was constrained to condescend thereunto; which being signified to the State of Venice by the Gouernour, the Senate considering that it was not now time to stirre vp so mightie a Prince, determined to set him at libertie. But to hide his dishonour, and to reape some fruite of his deuice, he gaue eare to the Popes desire, by whose meane it being concluded (but secretly) that to assure the Venetians that the Marquis should not moue against them, his eldest sonne should be put into the Popes hands, the Marquis was conueyed to Bologna, where after he had deliuered ouer his sonne to the Agents of the Pope, being now at libertie, he went to Mantua, excusing himselfe both to Cæsar and the French King by the necessitie he had to redresse his owne estate, that he came not to their armies to do them seruice, as freeholder to the one, and souldier to the other, (for the French King held him always in the number of his Pensioners) although in very deed his intention was to remaine a neuter.

The Pope determineth to assaile Genes.

Matters being thus vnhappily begun, had nothing diminished the hopes of the Pope, who perswading himselfe more then euer of the mutations of Genes, determined to assaile it againe. By reason whereof the Venetians following him more by necessitie, then that they approued of his furious dealing, augmented their nauie which was at Ciuitauecchio with foure great ships; and when the Pope had ioyned thereunto one of his Galeasses with some other vessels, perswading himselfe that his name would most easily induce the Genowayes to rebell, he blessed his banners publikly with Pontificall ceremonies; all men maruelling, that now whē his thoughts were made manifest, and that within Genes were many souldiers, and a strong nauie within the hauen, how he could hope to obtaine that, which he was not able to atchieue when the hauen was disarmed, when there was but a small garrison within the Citie, and when there was no doubt at all of him. To the armies at sea which were followed by the banished faction, and also by the Bishop of Genes, sonne of Obietto de Fiesquo, were to be ioyned the land forces. For Federike Archbishop of Salerne, brother to Octauian Fregosa, leuied with the Popes money companies of footmen and horsemen in the countrey of Lunigiana, John de Sasatella and Reinold de Sasseto his Captains, hauing commandement to be readie with their regiments at Bagno de Porretto, to make an approch to Genes as occasion should require. But in that Citie had bene made mightie prouisions both by sea and land, and therefore at the bruite of the approch of the nauie of the enemie, wherein were fifteene light galleys, three great galleys, one galeasse, and three Biscain ships, the French nauie lanching out of the hauen of Genes with two and twentie light galleys, went to meete them at Portouenere: and the diuersitie of vessels was to them a suretie, for that being inferiour to the enemies being vnited together in one strength, but superiour or at least equall in force in respect of the galleys, they might alwayes by their swiftnesse in dispersing saue themselues from the ships. The two nauies approched one another aboue Portouenere within the shot of the artillery, and after they had exchanged betweene them certaine volleys of shot, the Popes nauie went to Sestria, which is in the coast of Leuant, from whence they presented themselues afore the port of Genes, John Fregosa entring within ỹ port with a Brigantine: but the towne being so straitly guarded that the contrary faction could not rise, and the artillery of the tower of Codisa thundring without ceassing, they were constrained to retire. Afterwards they sailed to Portouenere, and spending many houres afore it without any effect, despairing of the successe of the whole enterprise, they returned to Ciuitauecchia; from whence the Venetian vessels departing with the Popes consent to returne into their owne seas, they fell distressed at Far de Messina with such a furious tempest, that fiue of their galleys were lost, & the others were cast vpon the coast of Barbarie, from whence, being much bruised, they fell at last into the ports of the Venetians.

tians. The forces that ſhould haue come by land, were not in this action, for that the companies that were leuied in the countrey of Lunigiana ſtirred not, iudging it an enterpriſe full of perill to enter the coaſt of Leuant, for the preparations which the French had made: and ſuch as were readie at Bagno de Porreto, making excuſe that the Florentines would not ſuffer them to paſſe, marched no further, but entring into the mountaine of Modena, which yet obeyed the Duke of Ferrara, they aſſailed Fanana, which though they could not obtaine at the beginning, yet in the end (for that the mountaine men ſaw no hope of ſuccours from the Duke of Ferrara) they yeelded to them. Thus till this day had nothing ſucceeded to the Pope of all that he had attempted againſt the French king: for that there was no mutation at Genes, as he did aſſuredly promiſe himſelfe; neither did the Venetians, after they had in vaine aſſailed Verona, hope for any aduancement on that ſide: neither did the Swiſſers accompliſh any thing, their action being rather in demonſtration then in effect: and touching Ferrara, whither the French had ſent ready ſuccours, and the Winter approching, there was no apparence of any danger; onely he had ſurprized Modena, a recompence vnworthy of ſo great emotions. But it ſeemed to be with the Pope, diſappointed of ſo many hopes, as the Poets haue left written of Anteus, who being tamed by the forces of Hercules, as often as he was throwne to the ground, ſo often did appeare in him a greater ſtrength and courage. Euen ſo was it with the Pope in his aduerſities; for when he ſeemed moſt deiected and moſt oppreſſed, then did he moſt lift vp himſelfe with a ſpirit more conſtant and reſolute, promiſing himſelfe for the time to come more then euer: and yet he had almoſt no other foundations then of himſelfe; and that which he preſuppoſed (as he would openly ſay) that albeit he was vtterly voide of valiant and loyall armes, hauing no other aſſured friends then the Venetians who by neceſſitie ran the ſame fortune; neuertheleſſe for that his enterpriſes were not vndertaken for any particular intereſt, but of an onely and ſincere deſire to ſet Italy at libertie, he doubted not, with the aide of God, to manage them to an iſſue honorable, happie and commendable. He could not hope much of the Venetians, for that they were alreadie drained of money, and oppreſſed with many difficulties: and the King Catholicke ſeemed rather to counſell him ſecretly, then to aide him openly; for that on the other ſide he vſing his ordinarie ſubtiltie, entertained amitie with Maximilian and the French King: and albeit he made him many promiſes, yet he held him in ſuſpence with many exceptions and delayes. And touching the trauell he had vſed to ſeparate Cæſar from the French King, and to bring him to agreement with the Venetians, it ſeemed euery day more vnprofitable: for that Cæſar, at ſuch time as the Pope had ſent out an armie againſt the Duke of Ferrara, had ſent an Herald to charge him not to moleſt him: and Conſtantine de Macedonia being gone in the Popes name to ſolicite an accord betweene him and the Venetians, he did not onely refuſe to heare him, but giuing to vnderſtand that he would more firmly knit himſelfe with the French King, he ſpake of ſending vnto him the Biſhop of Gurci to negociate with him of all their affaires. Alſo the Electors of the Empire, notwithſtanding they bare great inclination to the name of the Pope, and to the deuotion of the ſea Apoſtolike, would not heare ſpeake of the expences: in ſo much as being addicted onely to the affaires of Germanie, they were not to do him any great ſeruice in thoſe actions. And it ſeemed he could not hope much more of the King of England, notwithſtanding he was yong, and deſirous of innouations; and had made profeſſion to affect the greatneſſe of the Church, and had heard his Embaſſadours, not without ſome inclination of mind: for that being ſo farre remoued from Italy, as well by land as by ſea, he was not able of himſelfe to embaſe the French king, hauing withall ratified the peace with him, and by a ſolemne Embaſſage ſent to that end, receiued the full confirmation. Certainly any other, who had ſo weake foundations, and ſo great impediments, would haue abated in courage, ſeeing withall he had the meanes to obtaine peace with the French King, with ſuch conditions as a conqueror could hardly deſire greater. For the King conſented to abandon the protection of the Duke of Ferrara, though not directly in regard of his honour, yet indirectly to ſatisfie the Pope, referring it to the arbitration of the law, but into the hands of ſuch Iudges as would haue pronounced according to the Popes will: who albeit he was certaine that he might obtaine this forme of peace to his quiet and honour, yet he added, that ouer and beſides theſe, he would haue the King to leaue Genes at libertie, proceeding in theſe actions with ſuch obſtinacie, that not one of his deareſt familiars durſt once aduiſe him to the contrarie: and which more is, the Embaſſadour of Florence offering to ſound him according to the Kings commandement, put him into great and to refuſe the depoſing of the Gonfalonnier from the Magiſtracie, and that if the enemies were obſtinate herein, they ſhould looke to the defence of their libertie and common countrey, ſparing neither goods nor life in that action. Then all mens thoughts being turned to the warre, and to the prouiſions of money, they ſent men to the towne of Prato, ten miles from Florence, which they thought would be the firſt place that would be aſſailed by the Viceroy: who after he had gathered together his army at Barberina, together with the artillery which was drawne with great difficultie, both for the ill way of the Appenin, and alſo for that for want of money they lacked labourers and inſtruments neceſſary for the cariage, he tooke the way to Prato, as had bene formerly iudged: where being arriued at the breake of day, he began the ſame day to batter the gate Mercatala with two Falconets about the ſpace of an houre, but he preuailed litle there, for that it was well rampiered within. The Florentines had beſtowed within Prato about two thouſand footmen, the moſt part of their garriſon ſouldiers, and the reſidue leuied in haſte of all ſciences and baſe trades; and in that number there were very few experienced and trained to the warre. They had alſo ſent thither with an hundred men at armes Luke Sauello an ancient Captaine, but yet neither for his age, nor by experience, had attained to any degree of martiall knowledge: and the men at armes were the very ſame who a litle before had bene ſtripped in Lombardie. Hereunto was added, that by reaſon of the ſhortneſſe of the time, and the ignorance of ſuch as had the charge to make prouiſions, there was great want of artilleries within Prato, and not halfe the munitions and other things neceſſary to defend the place. The Viceroy had in his armie two hundred men at armes, fiue thouſand Spaniſh footmen, and two Cannons onely, which was an armie very ſmall in numbers and other prouiſions, but great in valour, for that the footmen were all of thoſe bodies, who with ſo great reputation were retired from the battell of Rauenna, and who like men of warre repoſing much in their vertue, deſpiſed greatly the ignorance of their aduerſaries. But being come, without hauing taken order for victuals, and finding ſmall ſtore in the country (for that although the harueſt was hardly finiſhed, it was all carried into places of ſtrength) they began immediatly to fall into want, wherewith the Viceroy being terrified, he began to incline to accord, whereof there was continuall ſolicitation, namely, that the Florentines ſuffering that the Medices might returne equall with the other Citizens, and without ſpeaking any more of the depoſing of the Gonfalonnier, the Citie ſhould pay to the Viceroy, to the end that he might withdraw his armie from off their dominions, a certaine ſumme of money, which was ſuppoſed not to exceed thirtie thouſand duckats: and therfore the Viceroy had granted a ſafeconduct to the Embaſſadors elected for that expedition, and had abſtained vntill their coming any more to aſſaile Prato, if they within had in any ſort furniſhed him with victuals. There is nothing that flieth faſter away then occaſion: nothing more dangerous then to iudge of the intention and profeſſion of another: and nothing more hurtfull then an immoderate ſuſpition. All the chiefe Citizens deſired agreement, being accuſtomed by the example of their elders, to defend their libertie againſt armes with gold: and therefore they made requeſt, that the Embaſſadours elect ſhould depart incontinently, being charged among other things to ſee them of Prato furniſh the Spaniſh armie with victuals, to the end the Viceroy might expect with patience if the compoſition that was now in hand would ſort to any effect. But the Gonfalonnier perſwading himſelfe (againſt his naturall timorouſneſſe) that the enemies deſpairing to be able to do any thing, would depart of themſelues, or fearing the Medices by what meanes ſoeuer they ſhould returne to Florence, or his deſtinie puſhing him on to be the cauſe of his owne ruine, and the calamitie of his country, he held artificially in delay the diſpatch of the Embaſſadours, not ſuffering them to depart the day that was appointed according to the reſolution which had bene made: in ſo much as the Viceroy when he ſaw himſelfe preſſed with the want of victuals, and being vncertaine whether the Embaſſadours would come, diſlodged by night from the gate Mercatala, and incamping before the gate called Serraglio, from the which the way goeth to the mountaine, he began to batter the next wall with two Cannons, chuſing that place for the commoditie of a high heape of earth ioyning to the wall, by the which he might eaſily aſcend to the breach of the wall aboue that was battered: the which facilitie for them without, being turned into a difficultie for them within the towne, for that the breach that was made aboue the heape of earth, remained within very high and far from the ground, one of the Canons was broken at the firſt execution, and the other with the which the battery was continued, had ſo loſt his force with often ſhooting, that

the bullets came very ſlackly to the wall, and did litle harme. Neuertheleſſe, after they had in the ſpace of many houres made a breach in the wall of more then twelue fadomes, certaine of the Spaniſh footmen being gotten vp to the heape of earth, began to aſſaile the breach; from thence they got to the top of the wall, where they ſlue two of the footmen that guarded it, for whoſe death the reſidue beginning to retire, the Spaniards climbed vp quickly by the helpe of ſcaling ladders: and albeit there was within neare the wall a ſquadron of ſhot and pikes, beſtowed there to ſuffer none of the enemies to ſtay vpon the wall, and to make ſlaughter of the firſt that raſhly ſhould leape in, or otherwiſe get downe; yet as ſoone as they ſaw the enemies vpon the wall, they brake their ranke, and of themſelues abandoned the defence of the place: ſo the Spaniards being amazed to ſee ſo great cowardize and litle experience in men of warre, made their entrie in ſundry places without impediment, and began to run through the towne, where was ſeene no other thing then flying, violence, ſpoiling, bloud, murders, and crying; the footmen of the Florentines making no reſiſtance, but caſting away their weapons, offered their bodies to the rigour of their enemies: from whoſe couetouſneſſe, luſt and crueltie, nothing had eſcaped, if the Cardinall de Medicis hauing beſtowed guards in the great Church, had not ſaued the honour of women, which in their calamitie were fled thither for ſafetie. There were more then two thouſand men that died, not fighting (for not one fought) but in flying, or crying for mercie: and all the reſidue were made priſoners, together with the Florentine Commiſſioners. Prato being loſt, they of Piſtoya, not falling otherwiſe from the iuriſdiction of the Florentines, agreed to relieue the Viceroy with victuals, receiuing his promiſe not to be diſtreſſed by his armie. Prato taken by the Spaniards.

But as ſoone as the ſucceſſe of Prato was knowne at Florence, by reaſon whereof the Embaſſadours that went to the Viceroy, being on the halfe way, were returned, there was diſcerned great alteration in the minds of euery one. The Gonfalonnier repenting the vanitie of his counſell, being amazed, and hauing almoſt altogether loſt both reputation and authoritie, rather vngouerned then gouerning, and altogether vnreſolued, gaue himſelfe vp to the wils of others, without making prouiſion either for his owne ſafetie, or the common tranquillitie. Others, who deſired alteration of the gouernment, waxing bold, diſcõmended publikly the things preſent: but the moſt part of the Citizens who were not accuſtomed to armes, and who ſet afore their eyes the miſerable example of Prato, notwithſtanding they affected the popular gouernment, remained, by reaſon of feare, as a miſerable prey to whoſoeuer would oppreſſe them. By reaſon of theſe things Paul Vettori and Anthonie Franciſquo Albizi, Gentlemen ſeditious and deſirous of innouation, becoming more audacious (who had many moneths afore conſpired ſecretly with others in fauour of the Medices, and to agree with them of the maner of their reſtoring, had ſecretly ſpoken with Iulian de Medicis in a village of the Florentine territory neare to Sienna) determined to make experience to draw the Gonfalonnier out of the publike Pallace by force: and hauing communicated their counſell to Bartholomew Valori a yong man of the like condition, and intangled (by his vnreaſonable prodigalities) with ſundry debts, as was alſo Paul Vettori, they went the ſecond morning after the loſſe of Prato, being the laſt day of Auguſt, with a ſmall companie to the Pallace, where, for that the Gonfalonnier had left all things to aduenture, finding no great guard or reſiſtance, they entred his chamber, and threatned him to take his life from him if he would not depart the Pallace; but in caſe he would go out, they gaue him their faith to defend him from harme. Whereunto he yeelding, and the whole Citie riſing into tumult, many diſcloſing themſelues againſt him, and not one in his fauour, when (as they had appointed) he had preſently cauſed ỹ Magiſtrates to aſſemble, who, hauing according to the lawes great authoritie ouer ỹ Gonfalonniers, they required that he might be lawfully depriued of the Magiſtracy, threatning ỹ otherwiſe they wold kil him. In wch feare depoſing him contrary to their wil, they led him in ſafetie into ỹ houſe of Paul Vettori, frõ whẽce the night following, being wel accompanied, he was conueyed vpon the dominions of Sienna, and frõ thence making ſhew to go to Rome with ſafeconduct of the Pope, ſecretly taking the way of Ancona, he paſſed by ſea to Ragouſa, for that he was aduertiſed by his brother the Cardinal, that the Pope wold breake his promiſe with him, and ſpoile him of the money which he had, which was ſuppoſed to be in great quantitie. As ſoone as the Gonfalonnier was depoſed from the Magiſtracie, the Citie diſpatched preſent Embaſſadours to the Viceroy, with whom they compounded eaſily by meanes of the Cardinall de Medicis; for the Cardinall was content that in reſpect of him there ſhould be no further mention, then of the reſtoring of him and his, and of all ſuch as had followed him; as priuate Citizens, with power to redeeme within a certaine time their goods that had bene alienated by the fiske; but reſtoring the moneys that had bene disburſed, and the increaſe that was made by ſuch to whom they had bene transferred: and touching common affaires, the Florentines entred the league. They bound themſelues (according to that which the Medices had promiſed at Mantua to the Biſhop of Gurci in recompence of their returne) to pay to the Emperour fortie thouſand duckats, to the Viceroy twentie thouſand, and for the armie foureſcore thouſand, the one halfe preſently, and the reſidue within two moneths: but vpon this condition, that the firſt paiment being receiued, the armie ſhould forthwith depart from off the lands of the Florentines, relinquiſhing all that they had taken. Beſides this, they contracted a league with the King of Aragon, with bonds reciprocall for certaine numbers of men at armes for the defence of their eſtates, and that the Florentines ſhould entertaine in their pay two hundred men at armes of the ſubiects of that King; and although it was not expreſſed vnder whom, it was intended vnder the Marquis of Paluda, to whom the Cardinall had promiſed, or at leaſt giuen hope, to make him Generall of the Florentine men of warre. The Gonfalonnier being driuen away, and the dangers of the warre remoued by the compoſition, the Citizens began to correct the gouernment in points wherein the former forme was thought vnprofitable: but with an vniuerſall intention (except of a very few, who were yong, and almoſt of no reſpect) to preſerue the libertie and the Councel popular. Therefore they determined with new laws, that the electiõ of the Gonfalonnier ſhould no more be for perpetuity, but for one yeare onely: and that to the Councell of the foureſcore, which changed from ſixe moneths to ſixe moneths, and by whoſe authoritie the cauſes of greateſt weight were determined, to the end there might be a continuall communitie of the Citizens of greateſt qualitie, ſhould be alwaies added all ſuch as had adminiſtred either at home or abroad the chiefe offices and honours: at home, ſuch as had bene either Gonfalonnier of iuſtice, or of the ten of the Balia, which is an office in that Commonweale of great authoritie; abroad, all ſuch as being choſen by the Councell of the fourſcore, had ſerued either as Embaſſadours to forreine Princes, or elſe as generall Superintendents in the warre: the ordinances of gouernment remaining firme and ſtable in all other matters. After theſe things were reſolued, they elected Gonfalonnier for the firſt yeare, Iohn Baptiſta Rodolfe, a noble Citizen, and who was eſteemed very wiſe; the people reſpecting (according to the maner of troubleſome times) not ſo much ſuch as by popular practiſes were moſt agreeable to them, as one, who by the great authoritie he had in the Citie, ſpecially with the Nobilitie, and by his proper vertue could ſupport and eſtabliſh the tottering eſtate of the Commonweale. But things were already too much out of order, and the common liberty had too many mightie enemies; in the bowels of the countrey an army ſuſpected, and within the Citie the moſt audacious of the youth deſirous to oppreſſe it, to whoſe wils was conformable the deſire of the Cardinall de Medicis, notwithſtanding in words he made ſhew of the contrary. For he who from the beginning eſteemed not the reſtoring of him and his as priuate Citizens, a recompence worthy of ſo many trauels and paines, conſidered further now, that this alſo could not long endure, for that together with his name, they ſhould be greatly hated of euery one, the other citizens liuing in continuall ſuſpition, that they would dreſſe ſome ambuſh againſt their libertie: and much more, for diſdaine that they had brought the Spaniſh army againſt their country, & bin the cauſe of the moſt cruell ſacke of Prato: and becauſe that for feare of armes the Citie had bene conſtrained to receiue ſuch baſe and vniuſt conditions. To this he was vrged by ſuch as afore had conſpired with him, and ſome others who in a Commonweale well ordered held no honorable place. But the conſent of the Viceroy was neceſſary, who expecting the firſt paiment, which for the ill condition of the citie could not ſo ſoone be procured, kept as yet within Prato, and had no fancie (whatſoeuer the cauſe was) that any new change ſhould be made in the Citie of Florence. Notwithſtãding the Cardinal declaring vnto him (& cauſing the Marquis of Paluda & Andrew Caraffe Earle of S. Seuerin, Captaines in the armie, to do the like) that the name of the Spaniards could not but be very odious to a Citie againſt which they had done ſo many harmes, and that in all occaſions they would ſticke alwayes to the enemies of the King Catholike; yea, that there was danger, leſt when the army ſhould depart, they would reuoke the Gonfalonnier, whom they had expulſed by conſtraint: and being further moued, for that the money was ſo long vnpayed which they had promiſed him, which if they had ſooner performed, the Florentines might haue

layed a better foundation for a free gouernment, he consented to the desire of the Cardinall, who as soone as he had made agreement and resolution of the affaires with him, came with diligence to Florence into his houses, and many Captaines and souldiers of the Italians entred, some with him, and some separate, the Magistrates not hauing the courage to let their entrie, for feare of the Spaniards that were at hand. The next morning a Councell of many Citizens being assembled at the publike Pallace to consult of the present affaires, Iulian de Medicis being present and assisting the action, the souldiers charged the gate of the Pallace on a sudden, and climing vp by ladders, they made themselues maisters thereof, making pillage of the siluer vessell which was kept there for the seruice of the Citie; which together with the Gonfalonnier, compelled to giue place to the wils of such as could do no more with weapons then the Magistrate could with reuerence and authoritie, called together presently with the ringing of the great bell (by the direction of Iulio de Medicis) the people, to Parliament vpon the Pallace green: where, such as went thither being enuironed with armed souldiers, and by the yong men of the Citie that had taken armes for the Medices, they consented that to fiftie Citizens of the Cardinals naming, should be giuen the same authoritie in publike businesse, which the whole people had, (which large kind of power the Florentines call Ampla balia.) Now by the decree of these men, the gouernment being reduced to that forme which it caried before the yeare a thousand foure hundred ninetie and foure, and a garrison established within the Pallace, the Medices resumed the same state of greatnesse which their father had, but their gouernment was more imperious, and with a power more absolute. In this sort was oppressed the libertie of the Florentines, being brought to that degree principally by the disagreements of the Citizens; into which it was thought it would not haue come, if they had not behaued themselues so negligently in the defence of the publike businesse, specially in the lateſt times, not to speake of the neutralitie, which they vsed very vndiscreetly, and the cowardize of the Gonfalonnier, giuing too much head to the enemies of the popular gouernment. For the King of Aragon had not from the beginning so great a desire to subuert the libertie, as to turne away that Citie from the alliance of the French King, and to draw from thence some summes of money to pay his armie: in so much that as soone as the French had abandoned the Duchie of Millan, he sent to tell the Viceroy, that whether the affaires occurrent should draw him to another enterprise, or for any other occasion he should know that the restitution of the Medices would be difficult, determining according to the condition of the times, he should deale with the Citie as he thought good, and to the best aduantage for his affaires. This was his commandement in the beginning: but being afterwards discontented with the Pope for that he would haue done to Alphonso d'Este at Rome, and entring withall into suspition for the threats he gaue publikely against strangers, he gaue plainly to vnderstand to the same Embassadour of Florence that came to him in the beginning of the warre, (enioyning no lesse to the Viceroy) that there should be no striuing to alter the gouernment: either for that he iudged it would be a thing of more suretie for him to preserue the Gonfalonnier, who was enemy to the Pope, or else for that he feared lest the Cardinall of Medicis being restored, would depend more of the Pope then of him: but this last deliberation came not to the knowledge of the Viceroy vntill the day after the Commonweale was reduced into the power of the Cardinall. By this discourse it may be discerned, that if the Florentines, after the French were chased away, had diligently looked to assure their affaires by some agreement, or at least had made themselues strong with armes & trained souldiers, either the Viceroy had not marched against them, or at least finding resistance, he would easily haue compounded with them for money. But their destinie would not suffer them so to do, although besides that which might be coniectured by humane reasons, they had bene warned of the perils imminent to them, by signes from heauen: for, not long afore, the lightning that fell vpon the gate that leades from Florence to Prato, caried away from an ancient shield of Marble, the golden flower de Luces, which are the armes of France and another time a flash of lightening descending from the top of the Pallace into the chamber of the Gonfalonnier, touched no other thing then a great boxe of siluer, wherein were wont to be gathered the voices of the great Magistrate: and afterwards falling downe, it stroke so violently a great stone at the foote of the staires, which bare vp the whole weight of the building, that being remoued from his place without any hurt, it seemed to be pulled from thence with great dexteritie by men skilfull in Architecture.

the artilleries which the Pope had lent them, the Castle-keeper being corrupted with a bribe of ten thousand duckats, deliuered it vp to the townesmen; being hereunto moued, for that an armie by sea which was sent out of Prouence for the defence of the towne before the King had knowledge of the rebellion, hauing not the courage to take land, were retired, so that he had no hope to be succoured. But the Lanterne held out for the King, whereinto the same day certaine French vessels had conueyed victuals and other necessary prouisions. As soon as the matters of Florence were dispatched and the mony receiued, the Viceroy raised the camp to march to Bressia, which Citie, the Venetian armie, hauing appeased the Swissers, held besieged afore the gate of S. Iohn, battering at one time both the towne and the Castle with artilleries planted vpon the opposite mountaine. And likewise had hope to be let in at the gate of Piles by meanes of an intelligence, which proued vaine, for that it was disclosed. But when the Spanish armie arriued at the borough of Gairo which is neare to Bressia, Monsieur d'Aubigny Captaine of the French that were within, determined to giue vp the towne together with the Castle to the Viceroy, with composition that all the souldiers that were within, should issue out, their goods and liues saued, but their Ensignes folded, and the points of their weapons downeward, and leauing behind them their artillerie. And it was thought that Monsieur d'Aubigny preferred the Viceroy before the Venetians, hauing receiued a commandement a litle afore from his King, to deliuer it rather to the Spaniards or to Cæsar, not for any hatred that he bore them, but to entertaine matter of contention with Cæsar and the King of Aragon. The French men that kept Legnaguo, had followed the same counsell afore the Spaniards came into Lombardie: for, litle esteeming of the many offers of the Venetians, they surrendred it vp to the Bishop of Gurci, vnto whom Pesquiero yeelded at the same time that the Viceroy entred Bressia, the possession whereof the same Bishop desired to haue, but it pleased the Viceroy thē to retaine it for the League, in whose name he had receiued it. It happened otherwise to the towne of Crema, about the which lay incamped Rance de Cere with part of the Venetian souldiers: for that foure thousand Swissers which Octauian Sforce Bishop of Loda and Gouernour of Millan had sent to conquer it in the name of the future Duke Maximilian Sforce, being approched, Benedict Cribario who was corrupted by gifts, and a promise to be created a Gentleman of Venice, gaue it vp to the Venetians, with the consent of Monsieur Duraz that kept the Castle, who reposed no confidence for his safetie in the faith of the Swissers. Afterwards the Bishop of Gurci went to Rome, whom the Pope desiring earnestly to haue at his deuotion, forcing his nature, he caused him to be receiued through all his dominions with all sorts of honors: defraying his expences by the way, together with all such as followed him, making them great cheare. All the townes receiued him with excessiue and vnusuall honours, the wayes being filled with such as went to meete him, and in many seuerall places he was visited by sundry new Embassadours of Prelates and personages of honor whō the Pope sent vnto him: and he was desirous that the Colledge of Cardinals should haue gone to the gates of Rome to receiue him, but the Colledge refusing it, as a matter not onely new, but full of great indignitie, the Cardinals Aginense and of Strigonia went by the medowes halfe a mile out of the gates to receiue him in the name of the Pope, who led him to S. Maria de Popolo, he being in the middest betweene them as Lieutenant to Cæsar. And from thence, where the two Cardinals left him, accompanied with an innumerable multitude, he went to the Pope, who being in his Pontificall seate, in solemne habite, expected his coming in the publike Consistorie, where not many dayes before he had very honorably receiued the twelue Embassadours of the Swissers, whom all the Cantons had sent to him, both to giue him publike obedience, and to declare that that nation would be perpetuall defenders of the state of the Church, and to thanke him, that with so great honour he had giuen them the sword, the hat, the helmet, and the banner, together with the title to be the Defenders of the Ecclesiastike libertie. When the Bishop of Gurci was arriued, they began to debate of the establishment of the common affaires, whereof the principall point consisted in the remouing of particular quarrels & contentions, to the end that Italy might be so established, that with an vniforme courage and counsell it might be able to resist the French King: and that which herein was the most difficult, was the composition so many times practised betweene Cæsar and the Venetians. For, the Bishop of Gurci consented willingly that Padua, Treuisa, Bressia, Bergama and Crema should remaine to the Venetians, so farre forth as they would render Vincensa to Cæsar, renouncing the rights they pretended to the townes that Cæsar held, and paying to him presently two hundred thousand thouſand florins of Rhein, and thirtie thouſand yearely for euer in way of tribute. It diſpleaſed the Venetians to acknowledge themſelues tributaries for thoſe townes which they had poſſeſſed ſo many yeares as their owne: and no leſſe to giue ſo much money, notwithſtanding the Pope offered to lend them part of the ſumme. But that which troubled them moſt, was the reſtoring of Vincenſa; for they ſaid, that that were to ſeparate the bodie of their eſtate, and to deprive them of the commoditie to paſſe from the head and principall parts to the other members, and that thereby the poſſeſſion of Breſſia, Bergama and Crema would be vncertaine and ill aſſured. And beſides, to refuſe the more honeſtly, they ſaid, they had giuen their faith to the Vincentines the laſt time they put themſelues into their hands, neuer to ſeparate themſelues from them. Other conditions were debated betweene the Pope and the King of Aragons Embaſſadour, propounded partly more for reuenge of the complaints of others, then for any hope to obtaine them. For the Pope demanded that that King according to the contents of the confederation, ſhould aide him to conquer Ferrara: he required him to leaue off the protection of Fabricio and Marke Anthonie Colonno, againſt whom he had begun to proceed with ſpirituall weapons, for that they had forced the gate of Latran, and receiued Alphonſo d'Eſte who had rebelled againſt him, into thoſe townes whoſe iuriſdiction appertained directly to the Church. He required him to renounce the protections he had vndertaken in Tuſcane, of the Florentines, of the Siennois, of the Lucquois, and of Plombin, as matters done in diminution of the rights of the Empire, and generally ſuſpected of all Italy, but particularly of the Church: for that it was not profitable to the other Potentates that he ſhould haue ſo many alliances in Italy, and moſt dangerous for the Church, that a prouince belonging to the dominion of the ſame ſhould depend vpon his authoritie. To theſe things the Spaniſh Embaſſadours replied, that they refuſed not to aide him againſt Ferrara, ſo farre forth as according to the bonds of the ſame confederation, he made paiment of the mony due to the armie for the time paſt, and made prouiſion for the time to come: That it was an action not praiſeworthy to proceed againſt Fabricio and Marke Anthonie Colonno, for that as well by reaſon of their dependances, as for that they were Captaines of authoritie, if they were purſued, it would be the cauſe of a new warre: That the King Catholike could not leaue them abandoned, without ſpeciall preiudice to his proper honour, and that their ſeuerall ſeruices in the warres of the Pope and himſelfe againſt the French King, deſerued no ſuch recompence: And touching the complaint he made of the protections of Tuſcane, that it proceeded not of any good or iuſt zeale, but to the end that Sienna, Lucques and Plombin, ſhould remaine a prey to his couetouſneſſe, intimating notwithſtanding that the King would referre himſelfe in thoſe things to the will of Ceſar. All the Confederates agreed with full conſent, that Maximilian Sforce ſhould enter vpon the Duchie of Millan, but Ceſar conſented not to inueſt him, nor to endue him with the name of Duke or any iuſt title. But the complaints of the Biſhop of Gurci and the Spaniards were againe renewed touching the occupation of Parma and Plaiſance, in preiudice of the rights of the Empire, to the too much increaſe of the Popes greatneſſe, and weakening of the Duchie of Millan, which had need to be made more mightie, for that it lay alwayes open to the firſt inuaſions of the French: That in the capitulations of the League, the Pope had made mention of no other thing then of Bologna and Ferrara: That now he vſurped that which of long time paſt had not bene poſſeſſed by the Church of Rome, there being no certaine knowledge that euer ſhe had enioyed it, euen in the times moſt ancient: and that vnder colour of rights, whereof there appeared no authentike memorie, he ſhewing no other thing of the donations of Emperours, then a ſimple writing, which might be forged or feigned according to any mans fancie: and ỳ the Pope, notwithſtanding taking occaſion of the tumults of Lombardy, was his owne iudge, as in a matter manifeſt & notorious. Theſe diſputatiõs could not be eaſily reſolued. But that which moſt troubled the iſſue of things, was the controuerſie betweene Ceſar and the Venetians, by reaſon whereof the Pope did what he could, ſometimes prouoking them, ſometimes praying them, and ſometimes threatning them, for a deſire which he ſtill nouriſhed to preſerue the Venetians, for the common benefite of Italy, and for that he hoped by meanes of their ſuccours, to be able to take Ferrara without the aide of the Spaniards. The Embaſſadours of the King of Aragon laboured herein with great importunitie, fearing leſt to a common danger, there might be ſome cauſe giuen to the Venetians to turne their diſpoſitions to the French: but they were driuen to proceed circumſpectly, not to prouoke Ceſar to make alliance with the French, from whom their King had ſeparated him with ſo great paine, and for that he would not for other reaſons breake amitie with him. The Swiſſer Embaſſadours likewiſe did their vttermoſt endeuour, for that being bound to defend the Venetians, who alſo in that regard were bound to pay them euery yeare fiue and twentie thouſand duckats, they deſired not to be brought to this neceſſitie to breake their promiſes, or to oppoſe themſelues againſt Cæſar if he offered to vexe them. At laſt, when the Biſhop of Gurci could not be brought to relinquiſh the demand which he made that the Venetians ſhould render Vincenſa to Cæſar, nor the Venetians to be diſpoſed to giue it vp, who were not yet agreed touching the ſumme of money, the Pope, who deſired aboue all things, to the end to ſuppreſſe the name and authoritie of the Conuenticle of Piſa, that Cæſar might approue the Councell of Latran, proteſted to their Embaſſadours, that he ſhould be conſtrained to perſecute their Commonweale with armes ſpirituall and temporall: which proteſtation not mouing them, he proceeded to confederate onely with Cæſar, the Spaniſh Embaſſadour refuſing to deale in the action, either for that he had no commiſſion from his King, or for that that King, notwithſtanding he was reſolued in mind to aide Cæſar, ſought ſtill to nouriſh the Venetians with ſome hope. It was expreſſed in the proeme of the confederation, which was after ſolemnly publiſhed in the Church of S. Maria de Popolo: That the Venetians hauing obſtinately refuſed the peace, and the Pope, for the neceſſitie of the Chriſtian commonweale, had proteſted to abandon them; Cæſar did now enter and accept the league made in the yeare a thouſand fiue hundred and eleuen, betweene the Pope, the King of Aragon, and the Venetians, according as the libertie was then reſerued for him; and promiſed to cleaue to the Councell of Latran, diſanulling the commiſſion, and reuoking all the procurations & acts done in fauour of the conuenticle of Piſa: binding himſelfe not to aide any one of the ſubiects or enemies of the Church, but chiefly Alphonſo d'Eſte and the Bentiuoleis, occupiers of Ferrara and Bologna: and to call home all the bands of Almaine footmen that were in the pay of Alphonſo, together with Federike de Boſſolo that held of him. On the other ſide, the Pope promiſed to aide Cæſar againſt the Venetians with armes both ſpirituall and temporall, vntill ſuch time as he had recouered all that was contained in the league of Cambray. It was declared, that the Venetians were altogether excluded out of the league and truce made with Cæſar, for that in many ſorts they had impugned both the one and the other: That they were enemies to the Pope, to Cæſar and to the King Catholike, to whom they reſerued place to enter the confederation within a certaine time, and vnder certaine conditions: That the Pope could make no couenant with them without the conſent of Cæſar, or till Cæſar had recouered that which appertained to him, as was ſaid afore: That neither the Pope nor Cæſar, without reciprocall conſent, could contract or couenant with any Chriſtian Prince: That during the warre againſt the Venetians, the Pope ſhould do no hurt or diſpleaſure to Fabritio and Marke Anthonie Colonno, it being notwithſtanding left in his power to proceed againſt Pompey and Iulio, and ſome others that had bene declared rebels: That notwithſtanding he was ſuffered to poſſeſſe Parma, Reggia and Plaiſance, yet by this capitulation it was not meant to preiudice the rights of the Empire. When this confederation was publiſhed, the Biſhop of Gurci in the next ſeſſion of the Councell of Latran, adhered to the Councell in the name of Cæſar; and as his Lieutenant generall in Italy, diſanulled all commiſſions, acts and procurations, and teſtified in the preſence of the whole Councell, that Cæſar neuer conſented to the conuenticle of Piſa, diſauowing all ſuch as had vſed his name. This being done, the Biſhop of Gurci departed from Rome, to be preſent when Maximilian Sforce (being now come by commiſſion of Cæſar to Verona) ſhould take poſſeſſion of the Duchie of Millan: whoſe comming the Cardinall of Sion expected with an ill will, together with the Embaſſadours of the whole nation of Swiſſers, who were at Millan; for that they deſired that in the demonſtrations and ſolemnitie of the actions that were to be performed, it might appeare (as the truth was indeed) that the Swiſſers were the men that had chaſed the French men out of that ſtate, and by whoſe valbut and courage Maximilian Sforce receiued it. And yet the Viceroy obtained more by deuices & induſtry then by his authoritie, that they taried for the coming of the Biſhop of Gurci: who, after he had ratified at Florence in the name of Cæſar, the confederation made in Prato, and receiued certaine ſummes of money of the Lucquois, whom he tooke into protection, came at laſt to Cremona, where Maximilian Sforce and the Viceroy attended him: and from thence they went all together to Millan, to make their entrie, at the day appointed, into that Citie, with the ſolemnities and honours accuſtomed to new Princes. In which action, albeit it was long disputed betweene the Cardinall of Sion and the Viceroy, which of them should giue him the keyes at the entrie of the gate, in signe of possession, yet, in the end the Viceroy giuing place, the Cardinall put into his hands the keyes of the towne in the vniuersall name of the Swissers: and that day, being one of the last dayes of December, he did all things both in shew and act, that were necessary to make knowne that Maximilian Sforce receiued the possession of them: who was receiued with an incredible gladnesse of all the people, for the great desire they had to haue a Prince proper and particular, and for that they hoped he wold resemble his grandfather or his father, of whom the memory of the one was very famous in that state for his excellent vertues, and touching the other, the despites they had receiued by the gouernment of strangers, had turned their hatred into good will: and these gratulations and ioyes were not yet finished, when the Castle of Nouaro was recouered, for that they within yeelded it vp. The confederation made at Rome, had not taken away all hope of agreement betweene Cæsar and the Venetians, for that the Pope had suddenly sent to Venice Iaques Staffiley his Nuncio, with whom went three Embassadours of the Swissers to perswade them to accord: and on the other side, the Senate, the better to entertaine the good will of the Pope, and not to giue cause to Cæsar to inuade them with armes, had sent to their Embassadours a new direction to cleaue to the Councell of Latran, and commanded the men of warre as soone as the confederation was made, to retire vpon the territories of Padua: and therefore the Viceroy not willing to trouble the hopes of peace, had turned his armie towards Millan. But the same difficulties remaining touching the restitution of Vincensa and the money which Cæsar demanded, all these things were to no purpose: which was the cause that the Pope assailed not the Duke of Ferrara, whom (agreement being made betweene Cæsar and the Venetians) he supposed he should be able to vanquish with his owne forces and the aide of the Venetians, together with the bruite onely that the Spaniards were to come if need should be: for otherwise he had resolued to deferre that expedition till the Spring time, for that he esteemed it a hard matter to take Ferrara in the Winter, the situation being strong in respect of the riuer, and greatly fortified besides by the continuall industrie of Alphonso.

Maximilian Sforce restored to Millan.

If I make mention of that which was done in France that same yeare, it may haply seeme to some, that I go from my purpose, which hath bene, not to meddle with things done out of Italy: but because the affaires of that nation haue some affinitie with the businesse of these parts, and that to the successe of the one, the counsels and issues of the other were oftentimes conioyned, I am constrained not to passe them altogether vnder silence. About the beginning of May, sixe thousand English footmen sailed in vessels of Englaind and Spaine to Fontaraby, which is a frontier towne belonging to the Crowne of Spaine vpon the coast of France, standing vpon the Ocean sea: and it was (according to the couenants made betweene the father in law and son in law) together with the forces of Spaine, to assaile the Duchie of Guyen, which is a part of the prouince of Aquitaine, according to the ancient names and diuisions of the same: against which warre, the French King being not yet assured on the coast of Picardie, prepared the new leuie of eight hundred Lances which he had made, and waged many bands of footmen of the lower parts of Germanie not subiect to the Emperour: and knowing of what importance for the defence of the Duchie of Guyen, was the realme of Nauarre, which was the dowrie of Katherine de Foix, and possessed ioyntly with Iohn the sonne of Albert, who was her husband; he called to the Court the father of the said Iohn, and carefully considered how he might make him his friend and consociate: to which purpose the death of Gaston de Foix stood him in good stead, by the instigation of whom, pretending the same kingdome not to fall vpon the female, and by consequent to appertaine to him as to the next heire male of the house of Foix, the French King had pursued the said Iohn. On the other side, the King Catholike, who had set his eyes vpon that Realme, required the King of Nauarre to stand neuter betweene the French King and him: and that he would suffer his souldiers that were to enter France, to passe through his realme: and that for the assurance of these things he would put into his hands certaine places of strength, vnder promise to render them as soone as the warre should be ended. But the King of Nauarre being not ignorant of the drift of these demands, (for the ancient desire of the King of Spaine to get possession of the Realme of Nauarre was very manifest) chose rather to expose himselfe to an vncertaine perill, then to accept a losse vnauoidable, hoping that he should not faile of the succours promised by the French King, for whose affaires it came well to passe that the warre began

gan in the realme of Nauarre: and at the ſame time, either to giue more leiſure to ſuch as were appointed to come to his ſuccours, or to deliuer himſelfe if he could from thoſe demands, he treated with the King of Aragon, who according to his cuſtome proceeded in theſe matters with great cunning. But the induſtrie and warineſſe of the King of Aragon was not more hurtfull to the King of Nauarre, then the negligence of the French King; who growing more ſecure for that the Engliſh that were arriued at Fontaraby, had now for many dayes done nothing, and ſuppoſing withall, that the King of Nauarre was able with his owne forces to defend himſelfe for a time, he deferred very long to ſend him ſuccours. By reaſon whereof the King of Aragon who had cunningly nouriſhed and entertained the hopes of the King of Nauarre, conuerting thither with great expedition the bands which he had prepared to ioyne with the Engliſh, the King of Nauarre being vnprepared, deſpairing to be able to make reſiſtance, fled into Bearn beyond the Pyrene hils, and the realme of Nauarre being left abandoned (except certaine ſtrong places which yet held out for the King who was fled) fell, without any expences or difficultie, and more for the feare and reputation of the Engliſh that were at hand, then by his owne forces, into the power of the King of Aragon: who becauſe he could not affirme that he poſſeſſed it lawfully with any other title, alledged that he was iudicially impatronized of it by the authoritie of the Sea Apoſtolike. For the Pope being not ſatisfied with the happie ſucceſſe of Italy, had a litle before publiſhed a Bull againſt the French King, wherein naming him no more Moſt Chriſtian, but Moſt Noble, he ſubiected as well his perſon as whoſoeuer were his adherents, to all the paines of heretikes and ſchiſmatikes, permitting euery one to occupie their ſubſtances, eſtates, and all that appertained vnto them: and with the ſame ſeueritie being much offended that the Cardinals and other Prelates who were fled from Millan, had bene receiued into the towne of Lyons, he commanded vnder paine of moſt grieuous cenſures, that the Fayre accuſtomed to be kept at Lyons foure times euery yeare, with great affluence of Merchants, ſhould be hereafter holden in the Citie of Geneua, from whence King Lewis the eleuenth had taken it for the benefit of his kingdom: and laſtly, he had brought the whole realme of France vnder the Eccleſiaſticall interdiction. But after the King of Aragon had conquered the kingdome of Nauarre, which albeit is but of litle circuite, & of leſſe reuenue, yet for the ſituation is very conuenient for the kingdome of Spaine, and greatly auaileable to the ſuretie of it: he determined in himſelfe to paſſe no further, eſteeming it not profitable for him to make war againſt the French King beyond the Mounts. In this reſpect, and euer ſince the Engliſh men arriued, he had bene long in preparing his forces: and after the conqueſt of Nauarre, the Engliſh ſoliciting him to ioyne his forces with them, to march together and incampe afore Bayon, a Citie neare to Fontaraby, and ſtanding almoſt vpon the Ocean ſea, he propoſed vnto them other enterpriſes, in places more remoued from the ſea, alledging that Bayon was ſo manned and fortified, that there could be no hope to take it. Which things being contradicted by the Engliſh, who made no reckoning of any other conqueſt in the Duchie of Guyen beſides Bayon, when there had bene much time ſpent in theſe diſputes, the Engliſh who were angrie and thought themſelues mocked, embarking themſelues without commiſſion or licence of their Prince, returned into England. By reaſon whereof the French King remaining aſſured on that ſide, and fearing no more the inuaſions of the Engliſh by ſea, for that at laſt he was become ſo ſtrong by ſea, that he commanded from the coaſts of Spaine euen to the ſhores of England; he determined to make triall if he could recouer the realme of Nauarre: whereunto he was encouraged, beſides the departing of the Engliſh fleete, for that by reaſon of the ill ſucceſſes in Italy, all his bands of ſouldiers were returned into France. At the ſame time that the King of Aragon gaue hope to the Engliſh men to enter into the warre, the better to bring vnder him the whole iuriſdiction of the realme of Nauarre, he had ſent certaine regiments of men to S. Iohn Pedeportum, which is the vttermoſt towne of that kingdome, ſtanding at the foote of the Pyrene hils, on that ſide towards France: and afterwards the French forces beginning to increaſe thereabouts, he ſent thither with the maine armie Federike Duke of Alba, Captaine generall of that warre. But the French armie being at laſt become farre more mightie, whereunto was arriued the Daulphin of France, Charles Duke of Bourbon, and Monſieur Longueuille, the chiefe Princes of the realme of France, the Duke of Alba lying incamped in a ſtrong place betweene the plaine and the mountaine, held it an action very neceſſary to that ſeruice, to hinder the French men for entring into the realme of Nauarre: who being not able to force him out of that place for the ſtrength of the ſituation, determined termined that the King of Nauarre with ſeuen thouſand footmen of his countrey, and Monſieur de Paliſſa with his company of three hundred lances remouing from Saluatierra neare to S. Iohn Pedeportum, where the whole armie lay, ſhould paſſe the Pyrene hils by the way of the Vale of Roncales, and drawing neare to Pampeluna the capitall towne of the kingdome, wherein the people taking courage by the nearneſſe of the French, began alreadie to draw into mutinie, for the deſire they had of their King, they ſhould ſeize vpon the Vale of Roncales, by which way onely was brought to the Spaniſh armie victuals, whereof by reaſon of the ſterilitie of the countrey they had already ſome want in the place where they were. The ſucceſſe was, that the King of Nauarre and Monſieur de Paliſſa when they had wonne the way that is vpon the top of the Pyrene hils, tooke Bourget by aſſault, a towne that ſtands at the foot of the hils, wherein was Baldes Captaine of the guard to the King of Aragon, with many bands of footmen: and if they had vſed ſuch celeritie as they ſhould, to winne the Vale of Roncales, famine onely had bene ſufficient to vanquiſh the Spaniſh armie, enuironed on all ſides with enemies, and countries infinitely troubleſome. But the diligence of the Duke of Alba preuented them, who hauing left in S. Iohn Pedeportum a thouſand footmen with all the artillerie, he paſſed to Pampeluna by the Vale of Roncales afore they came thither. So that the King of Nauarre and Monſieur de Paliſſa being diſappointed of their hope, to whom alſo the Dauſphin had ſent a new ſtrength of foure hundred lances, and ſeuen thouſand Lanceknights, made their approch to Pampeluna with foure peeces of artillerie, which they had drawne with great paine and difficultie, by reaſon of the ſteepneſſe of the mountaines: and when they had giuen the aſſault, perceiuing they could not carry it for that the ſeaſon was againſt them (for it was in December,) and there was no meanes to recouer victuals in ſo barren a countrey, they repaſſed the Pyrene hils, vpon the which they were conſtrained to leaue their artillerie, both for the difficultie of the paſſages, and for the impediments giuen them by the men of the countrey. And at the ſame time Monſieur Lautrech who was entred Biſcay with three hundred Lances and three thouſand footmen, ſpoiling and burning the whole countrey, after he had in vaine aſſaulted the towne of S. Sebaſtian, repaſſed the mounts and returned to the armie, which now brake vp, both hope and feare ceaſſing on all parts, and the whole realme of Nauarre remaining free and peaceable to the King of Aragon. About this time it being detected that Ferdinand ſonne to the late Federike King of Naples, who called himſelfe Duke of Calabria, had ſecretly conſpired with the French King, and meant to ſteale to the French armie not farre from the towne of Logrogna, where at that time was the King of Aragon, he was by him ſent to the Caſtle of Sciatiua, whither the Kings of Aragon are wont to ſend ſuch priſoners as are perſonages of name, either for their nobilitie or for their vertue: and for the ſame cauſe Philip Coppolo a Neapolitane was quartered, who was the ſecret meſſenger to the French King in this action: Fortune ſo changing the ſtate of worldly things, that he was executed for the ſeruice of him, whoſe grandfather by the fathers ſide, had cut off the head of the Count de Sarny his father. This conſpiracie being diſcouered, was of ſome conſequence for the affaires of Italy: for, as it had his beginning of a certaine gray Frier, which the Duke of Ferrara had ſecretly ſent to Ferdinand; ſo the King Catholike hauing alreadie an inclination to ſatisfie the Popes will, tooke this matter ſo to heart, that he commanded the Viceroy and his Embaſſadour reſident with the Pope, to conuert when they thought good, his armie againſt Ferrara, demanding of him no more money then ſuch as ſhould be neceſſary to entertaine them. Theſe were the accidents of that yeare both in Italy, in France, and in Spaine.

The King of Aragon taketh the realme of Nauarre.

Now followeth the yeare a thouſand fiue hundred and thirteene, no leſſe full of memorable things then the former: in the beginning whereof, armes ceaſſing on all parts, (for that neither the Venetians moleſted others, nor any other moued againſt them) the Viceroy went to incampe with three thouſand footmen afore the rocke of Treſſa, which was rendred vnto him vnder condition that the bodies that were within ſhould depart with their goods ſaued. But all men were troubled in their minds with the conſideration of things to come: knowing that the French King being deliuered from forreine armes, and reincouraged both for the great louie of Lanceknights he had made, and for the increaſe of his numbers of men at armes, had nothing in ſo great deſire as to recouer the Duchie of Millan; which diſpoſition albeit it was very violent in him, and that he deſired much to haſten the warre, whileſt the Caſtles of Millan and Cremona were yet kept by his ſouldiers: notwithſtanding conſidering how he was hindered by the 1513.

oppoſing of ſo many enemies, and being not yet aſſured that the King of England would not make ſtrong warre againſt him the next Sommer, he determined to enter into no action, vnleſſe he could ſeparate ſome one of the Confederates from the common alliance, or elſe winne to him the amitie of the Venetians: of which things the yeare paſt gaue him many hopes that one of theſe might haply ſucceed to him. For when the Biſhop of Gurci went from Rome to Millan, he heard graciouſly by the way one of the familiar friends of the Cardinall de S. Seuerin, ſent to him from the French Queene, and afterwards ſent one of his men ſecretly into France to make this motion: That the King ſhould be bound to aide Cæſar againſt the Venetians: That the mariage ſhould go forward betweene the ſecond daughter of the King, and Charles nephew to Cæſar, to whom the King ſhould giue in dowrie the Duchie of Millan: and ſhould alſo giue vp to his ſaid daughter and future ſonne in law, the rights he pretended to the Realme of Naples: And to the end that ſimple words and promiſes ſhould not ſtand to Cæſar as a ſuretie, he required that the daughter might be immediatly put into his hands: And that when the King ſhould haue recouered the Duchie of Millan, Cremona and Guiaradadda ſhould be for Cæſar. The King hoped likewiſe that he might eaſily ioyne to him the Venetians, who were not a litle angrie at that time that the Viceroy occupied Breſſia, but much more for the matters which afterwards were accorded at Rome betweene Cæſar and the Pope. Therefore after that the King cauſed Andrew Gritti to come ſecretly to his Court, who hauing bin taken at Breſſia, remained as yet priſoner in France, and cauſed Iohn Iaques Triuulce, in whom the Venetians repoſed much, to ſend to Venice one of his Secretaries vnder colour of other affaires. He had alſo ſome hope to be able to compound with the King of Aragon, who (according to his cuſtome oftentimes to debate affaires by the negociation of religious men) had ſent ſecretly into France two gray Friers, to the end that expreſſing their zeale to the common benefit, they might begin to negociate with the Queene in ſome points, concerning the peace either vniuerſall or particular betweene the two Kings. Neuertheleſſe touching the particular, there was litle hope, the king knowing well enough that he would retaine the Realme of Nauarre, and to him it was a matter of no leſſe indignitie to leaue abandoned that King, who to reenter into his amitie and vnder hope of his ſuccours, was fallen into that calamitie. But nothing troubled ſo much the mind of the French king, as the deſire to reconcile the Swiſſers vnto him, knowing that thereupon depended his aſſured victorie, for the great authoritie that that nation then had, for the feare of their armes, and for that it ſeemed they had begun to gouerne themſelues, not as mercenarie ſouldiers, nor as ſhepheards, but with a care and vigilancie, as of a well ordered Commonweale, and as men brought vp in the adminiſtration of eſtates, and managing of affaires, without ſuffering any leuies to be made, but by good counſell and diſcretion: by reaſon whereof all Chriſtian Princes had Embaſſadours with them: the Pope with almoſt all the Potentates of Italy payed them yearely penſions, to be receiued into their confederation, and to leuie for their proper defence in times of neceſſitie, ſouldiers of that nation. The remembrance of which things made them ſo proud, that weighing how King Charles the eight by their armes had firſt troubled the quiet ſtate of Italy, and that afterward King Lewis his ſucceſſor, by their valour had conquered the Duchie of Millan, recouered Genes, and ouerthrowne the Venetians, they vſed towards all men an imperious and inſolent behauiour. And though the French King, beſides the perſwaſions of many particulars of that nation, and the opinion that they would become more flexible to him for the great offers of money that were made them, hoped he might winne them; for that ſuch as gouerned Millan, hauing agreed with the Embaſſadours of the Swiſſers in the name of Maximilian Sforce, that he ſhould giue them an hundred and fiftie thouſand duckats ſo ſoone as he had receiued the poſſeſſion of Millan and the Caſtles, and fortie thouſand duckats a yeare for the ſpace of fiue and twentie yeares, the Swiſſers taking him into their protection, with couenant to deliuer into his pay bands of their footmen; yet the Cantons would neuer ratifie it: by reaſon whereof, in the beginning of the yeare preſent, notwithſtanding afore he had in vaine proued to haue his Embaſſadours heard, which he meant to ſend to treate of theſe things, yet to purchaſe audience in their Diots, he conſented freely to giue vp to them the Caſtles of the Vale of Lugan, and of Lucarna: with ſo great indignitie great Princes ſought at that time the amitie of that nation. Then Monſieur Trimouille according to the commiſſion of the King, came to Lucerna, a place appointed to heare him in publike aſſembly; and albeit he was receiued in good ſort, yet he quickly perceiued he ſhould do

litle

litle good touching the Duchie of Millan: for that not many dayes before, fixe of the Cantons had ratified and subsigned the capitulations made with Maximilian Sforce, three had determined to confirme them, and touching the other three, they were not yet resolued: by reason whereof, speaking no more of Millan, he demanded that at least they would aide the King to recouer Genes and Ast, which were not comprehended in the capitulation made with Maximilian Sforce. For the better aduancement of which demand, Triuulce made request that he might be at the Diot, vnder colour to treate of particular affaires; and safeconduct was granted him, but with this condition, that he should not solicite in any matter appertaining to the French King: and being come to Lucerna, he was forbidden to haue any conference with Monsieur Trimouille, either in publike or in priuate. At last by an vniuersall consent, the capitulations made with the Duke of Millan were ratified by all the Cantons, and all the demands of the French King denied, with this addition, that they would not suffer any leuies of footmen of that nation to serue him either in Italy or out of Italy: by reason whereof the King seeing himselfe reiected of ỹ Swissers, perceiued that it was necessary for him to be reconciled either with Cæsar or with the Venetians, who treated also at the same time with Cæsar, for that the suspition of their reconciliation with the French King increasing in the minds of the Confederates, the Bishop of Gurci consented that they should retaine still Vincensa. But the same reasons encouraging the Senate which gaue feare to the enemies, they stood vpon this, to make no more peace if Verona were not rendred to them, recompencing Cæsar with a greater quantitie of money. In which demand some difficultie being found, the Venetians inclining so much the more to the amitie of the French, contracted with the Secretarie of Triuulce to be confederate with the King, according to the capitulations made betweene them afore, by the which Cremona and Guiaradadda should remaine to them. But the Secretarie set downe expresse mention in the capitulation, that that agreement should stand as voide and of none effect, if within a certaine time it were not approued by the King, in whose Councell the disputations were great, which was most to be desired, either a reconciliation with Cæsar, or a confederation with the Venetians: Robert a Secretarie of great authoritie, Triuulce, and almost all the chiefest of the Councell approued more the confederation with the Venetians; alledging that which the present experience had made them know of the inconstancie of Cæsar with so great detriment, the hatred he bare to the King, and his desire of reuenge; and that which they had heard of personages worthy of credit, who reported that they had often heard him say at that time, that he kept fixed in his mind the remembrance of seuenteene iniuries receiued from the French, and that whensoeuer oportunitie serued him to be reuenged of them all, he would not lose the occasion: and that these solicitations were practised by him for no other end, then by the meane of a reconciliation full of fraud, either to haue the better oportunitie to do harme, or at least to break off ỹ which he knew was practised with the Venetians, or else to detract the preparations of the war: & that they could not excuse him, nor esteeme him worthy of compassion, who being once beguiled by another, returneth vnwisely to repose confidence in him againe. The Cadinall of S. Seuerin was of another opinion, who (as his aduersaries said, crossing Triuulce more through enuie then for other occasion, for that with his brethren he had alwayes defended the Gibelin faction in Millan) replied on the contrary, that nothing could be more profitable to the King, then by ioyning with Cæsar, to breake the vnion of the enemies, specially the confederation being made by such meanes as they might hope it would last: it being proper to Princes, in their deliberations alwayes to preferre profite afore good will, hatred, and other affections: And what greater benefite could be done to Cæsar, then to aide him presently against the Venetians, with hope that his Nephew should come to succeed in the Duchie of Millan? That Cæsar being separate from the others, the King Catholike would not oppose against his authoritie, as well for the interests of his Nephew, as for other good regards. Moreouer, that nothing could more amaze the Pope, then this confederation: and on the contrary, that the confederation with the Venetians, was full of indignitie, since he must yeeld to them Cremona and Guiaradadda, members so conuenient to the Duchie of Millan, that to recouer them, the King had stirred vp all the world: and yet if the vnion of the residue were not broken, that the confederation with the Venetians would not suffice to obtaine the victory. At last this opinion preuailed, the rather for the authoritie of the Queene, who desired greatly the aduancement of her daughter, so farre forth as it might be obtained, that till the consummation of the mariage she might remaine with her, who would giue her faith and promiſe to keepe her in the name of Cæſar, as the aſſigned ſpouſe for his Nephew, and to deliuer her to her husband as ſoone as her age made her fit for mariage. But the King being afterwards certified that Cæſar would not admit this limitation, but rather that theſe things were by him artificially propounded, to cauſe him to proceed more ſlowly in his other proiects, he brake off from this practiſe, and ſent backe againe for Monſieur d'Aſparot brother to Monſieur de Lautrech, who was already gone from the Court to meete the Biſhop of Gurci with this commiſſion. On the other ſide, the feare of the vnion betweene the King and the Venetians increaſing dayly, the King of Aragon aduiſed Cæſar to render Verona, and with the money which he ſhould receiue of the Venetians, and with the Spaniſh armie, to transferre the war into Burgundie. The Biſhop of Gurci was of the ſame opinion, who hoping by his preſence to be able to moue Cæſar, returned into Germanie, being followed not onely of Dom Peter de Vree which was come with him, but alſo of Iohn Baptiſta Spinella Count of Carriato, Embaſſadour to the ſaid King of Aragon reſident with the Venetians. And firſt of all he perſwaded the Senate (to the end that new difficulties might not breake off the matters in queſtion) to make truce with Cæſar for all the moneth of March: and then the ſaid Embaſſadours ſhould giue them their faith, that Cæſar ſhould render Verona, if they would promiſe him within certaine times two hundred and fiftie thouſand duckats, and fiftie thouſand by the yeare.

The purpoſes of Pope Iulio the ſecond and his death.

In this alteration of affaires, and in ſo troubleſome a time, the Pope fell ſicke, who was full of more high conceits and deſires then haply at any time before: for when he had obtained the thing he deſired, his plots did nothing diminiſh, but increaſed dayly. He had determined in the beginning of the Spring to vndertake the enterpriſe of Ferrara ſo much deſired, which (as he thought) wold make litle reſiſtance, both for that it was naked of all ſuccours, and becauſe the Spaniſh armie was to ioyne with his companies: He had ſecretly bought of Cæſar for the price of thirtie thouſand duckats the Citie of Sienna for the behooſe of the Duke of Vrbin, to whom (except Peſera) he would neuer giue any thing of the Eccleſiaſtike eſtate, to the end to reſerue entire to himſelfe the glorie to haue ſimply and onely ſtudied for the exaltation of the Church: He agreed to lend to Cæſar fortie thouſand duckats, receiuing Modena in gage: He threatned the Lucquois who in the heate of the affaires of the Duke of Ferrara, had ſeized vpon Garfagnana, importuning them to deliuer it to him: And he was angrie with the Cardinall de Medicis, for that he thought he adhered more to the King Catholike then to him: and becauſe he perceiued he was not able to diſpoſe of the Citie of Florence as he thought, he ſtudied alreadie new plots & practiſes to alter the eſtate of Florence. He was diſpleaſed with the Cardinal of Sion, from whom he tooke the name of Legate, and enioyned him to come to Rome, for that in the Duchie of Millan he had appropriated to himſelf a yearly reuenue of more then thirtie thouſand duckats of the eſtates and goods of diuers perſons: The better to aſſure the Duke of Vrbin of Sienna by intelligences of his neighbors, he had of new taken into his pay Charles Baillon, to chaſe out of Perouſa Iohn Paul, who by affinitie was very neare conioyned to the ſons of Pandolfe Petrucci, ſucceſſors to the greatneſſe of their father: He would eſtabliſh for new Duke of Genes, Octauian Fregoſa, depoſing Ianus from that dignitie, whereunto the reſidue of the houſe of Fregoſa did conſent, becauſe for the degree that his anceſtors had held in that ſtate, it ſeemed beſt to appertaine to him: He ſtudied continually either how he might get the Spaniſh armie out of Italy, or ouerthrow it by the aide of the Swiſſers, whom onely he exalted and embraced: and that to this end, that the kingdome of Naples being poſſeſſed by him, Italy might remaine free frō ſtrangers, a ſpeech that often paſſed out of his mouth; and for this cauſe he had hindred that the Swiſſers did not confederate with the King Catholike. And yet (as though it had bene in his power to batter all the world at one time) continuing in his accuſtomed heat againſt the French King, although he had giuen eare to a meſſage frō the Queen, he ſtirred vp the King of England to make warre, to whom he had transferred by a publike decree of the Councell of Latran, the name of Moſt Chriſtian, whereof there was alreadie a Bull written, wherein was likewiſe contained the priuation of the dignitie and title of the King of France, giuing that kingdome to whom ſoeuer could ſeize vpō it. In theſe ſo great thoughts, and haply in others more ſecret and more great (for in a mind ſo fierce and terrible, all ſorts of imaginations how great and vaine ſoeuer they be, are not incredible) after the ſickneſſe of many dayes, death ſeized vpon him: whereby ſeeing himſelfe preuented, he called together the Conſiſtorie, wherein he could not be preſent in perſon, by reaſon of his diſeaſe, by the which he cauſed the Bull to be confirmed med which he had publiſhed before againſt ſuch as by ſymony would climbe to the Popedome: declaring that the election of his ſucceſſor appertained to the Colledge of Cardinals, and not to the Councell: and that the Cardinals ſchiſmatikes could haue no preſence there, to whom he ſaid he pardoned the iniuries they had done him, and prayed God to forgiue them the wrongs they had done to his Church. After this he beſought the Colledge of Cardinals, that for his ſake, they would grant to the Duke of Vrbin his Nephew, the Citie of Peſera in Vicarage, in conſideration that by the meanes of that Duke it had bene recouered to the Church after the death of Iohn Sforce. He ſhewed in no other matter any priuate or particular affection: in ſo much as Madame Felice his daughter (and many others for her ſake) intreating him with great importunitie, to create Cardinall Guido de Montfalcon being her brother by the mothers ſide, he anſwered roundly, that he was not worthy of that degree; and retaining in all things his accuſtomed conſtancie and ſeueritie, together with the ſame iudgement and force of mind which he had before his ſicknes, when he had deuoutly receiued the Sacraments of the Church, the night before the one and twentieth day of Februarie he ended the courſe of theſe preſent paines about the breake of day. He was a Prince of incredible conſtancie and courage, but violent, and of ſuch vnmeaſurable apprehenſions, as the reuerence that was borne to the Church, the diſcord of Princes, and the condition of the times, did more to ſtay him from his ruine, then either his moderation or diſcretion: worthy no doubt of great glory, if he had bene a Prince ſecular, or if that care and intention which he had to raiſe the Church into temporall greatneſſe by the meanes of warre, had bene employed to exalt it by the way of peace in matters ſpirituall. And yet neuertheleſſe he was lamented and eſteemed aboue all his predeceſſors, by thoſe, who (hauing loſt the true names of things, and being ignorant how to diſtinguiſh them rightly) iudged it the glutie of Popes rather to increaſe the iuriſdiction of the Sea Apoſtolike by armes and the bloud of Chriſtians, then to labour (by good example of life, and by curing and correcting of corrupt manners) for the ſauing of thoſe ſoules, for whom they boaſt that Ieſus Chriſt hath conſtituted them his Vicars in earth.

The Pope being dead, the Viceroy of Naples who was marched with his Spaniſh armie towards Plaiſance, conſtrained that Citie to returne, as it had bene accuſtomed to be, vnder the gouernmēt of the Dukes of Millan. And Parma did the like, hauing the ſame feare of the Spaniſh ſouldiers. On the otherſide, the Duke of Ferrara hauing ſuddenly recouered the townes of Romagna, drew neare to Reggia: but finding no tumult within the towne, he durſt not abide there for feare of the Spaniſh armie, which lay diſperſed betweene Plaiſance and Reggia. There was no other ſtirre or mouing in the ſtate of the Church, neither did the Citie of Rome nor the Colledge of Cardinals feele any of thoſe difficulties which they felt at the death of the two laſt Popes: by reaſon whereof the obſequies and funerals being ended according to the accuſtomed maner, foure and twentie Cardinals entred peaceably into the Conclaue, hauing firſt agreed that the Marquis of Mantuaes ſonne, whom Pope Iulio kept in his Court for hoſtage, ſhould be acquited of his faith and promiſe, with libertie to returne to his father. The firſt matter that was debated in the Conclaue, was with ſtrict articles to moderate the authoritie of the Pope to come, which they ſaid the laſt Pope had vſed too immoderatly: and yet (as amongſt men, ſome haue not the heart to oppoſe againſt a Prince and great Lord, and ſome deſire to enter into his grace) within a ſmall time after, of themſelues they diſanulled the moſt part of thoſe lawes. The ſeuenth day they choſe Pope without any diſcord of conſent, Iohn Cardinall of Medicis, who tooke vpon him the name of Leo the tenth, being but ſeuen and thirtie yeares of age, which was a very ſtrange matter, and contrary to cuſtome, which the yong Cardinals brought to paſſe by their induſtrie, hauing a long time afore ſecretly agreed among themſelues to create the firſt Pope of their number. The moſt part of Chriſtendome were very well pleaſed with this election, all men in generall perſwading themſelues, that he would become a rare and excellent Pope, as well for the freſh memory of the valour of his father, and for the fame of his liberalitie and benignitie, which was vniuerſally ſpread, as for the opinion of his continencie and life not attainted, together with an hope that by the example of his father, he would be a louer of learned men, and of all generous ſpirits. Whereunto was much helping the maner of his election, which was performed ſincerely, and without ſymonie or ſuſpition of other corruption. And it ſeemed that God began already to approue and confirme his ſeate, for that the fourth day after the election, the Cardinals of S. Croſſe and S. Seuerin, which had bene deprined of the Hat, came into his power, who as ſoone as they heard of the death of Pope Iulio, went by ſea to Rome accompanied with the Embaſſadour of the French King: and when they were arriued at the hauen of Liuorne, vnderſtanding that the Cardinall de Medicis was choſen Pope, truſting to his benignitie, and chiefly the Cardinall of S. Seuerin, for the ancient friendſhip and ſtrait familiaritie which he had had with him and his brother; when they had obtained ſafeconduct of the Captaine of Liuorne, which ſtretched no further then the bounds of his iuriſdiction, they tooke land, and without ſeeking other ſuretie, went vp voluntarily to Piſa: in which Citie they were honorably receiued, and afterwards being conueyed to Florence, they were ſo curteouſly guarded, that they had no diſpoſition to depart: the ſame being the deſire of the Pope, who ſending vnto them the Biſhop of Oruietto, exhorted them with words full of affection, that as well for their proper ſuretie, as for the tranquillitie of the Church, they would abide at Florence vntill it were determined in what maner they ſhould come to Rome; and that hauing bene iudicially depriued, and their depriuation confirmed in the Councell of Latran, they ſhould forbeare to go in the habite of Cardinals, to the end that making ſhew of their humiliation, they might giue him the better occaſion to reduce their affaires into good termes, as he had determined. The firſt act of the new Pope was his coronation, which was performed according to the cuſtome of his predeceſſors, in the Church of S. Iohn de Latran, with ſo great pompe, as well of his family and Court, as of all the Prelates, and many Lords that were there preſent, together with the people of Rome, that all men acknowledged that ſuch magnificence and ſumptuouſneſſe had not bene ſeene in Rome ſince the inundations of the ſauage nations: in which ſolemnitie the Standard of the Church was carried by Alphonſo d'Eſte, who hauing obtained ſuſpenſion of the cenſures, was come to Rome, with great hope, by the clemencie of the Pope, to be able to cõpound with him for his affaires. The Standard of the Knights of Rhodes was borne by Iulio de Medicis, mounted vpon a ſtately Courſer armed at all points, who by nature was inclined to the profeſſion of armes, but by deſtinie drawne to the Eccleſiaſtike life, wherein he may ſerue as a wonderfull example of the variation of fortune. That which made that day more memorable and admirable, was the conſideration that he who then with ſo rare pompe and glorie tooke the enſignes of ſo great dignitie, had bene the yeare before, and on the very ſame day, miſerably made priſoner. This magnificence confirmed in the multitude the opinion that was had of him, euery one promiſing himſelfe that Rome ſhould be happie vnder a Pope adorned with ſo great liberalitie and bountie, it being very certaine that he had ſpent an hundred thouſand duckats that day. But wiſe men deſired in him a greater grauitie and moderation: who iudged, that ſuch pompe was not conuenient for Popes, and that the condition of the preſent times required not that the treaſures gathered by his predeceſſor, ſhould be ſo vnprofitably ſpent. But ſo it was, that neither the changing of the Pope, nor other accidents, were ſufficient to eſtabliſh and aſſure the tranquillitie of Italy: for it was plainly diſcerned that matters tended more to warre then to peace: for Ceſar (who would heare no more of the rendring of Verona, fearing thereby to be depriued of all oportunitie to haue any eaſie entrie into Italy) albeit the truce was prolonged for the full moneth of Aprill, made no reckoning of the conditions of accord that had bene debated at Millan; and being diſcontented with the importunities of the Embaſſadours of the King Catholike, he told the Count of Carriato, that for the inclination he ſhewed to the Venetians, he might rather be called the Embaſſadour of Venice then of Spaine. But that which much more augmented this diſpoſition, was the truce that was made for a whole yeare betweene the French King and the King Catholike, onely touching the affaires out of Italy: the oportunitie of which truce gaue to the French King (being now deliuered from the ſuſpitions of Spaine) a great facilitie to renew the warre in the Duchie of Millan.

The diſpoſition of Princes to the warre.

The King Catholike did alwayes diſlike to haue warre with the French out of Italy, for that being not ſufficiently ſtored with money, and therefore conſtrained to helpe himſelfe with the forces of the Barons and peoples of Spaine, either he had no readineſſe of ſuccours, or elſe he was conſtrained in times of warre to remaine with them as it were in ſubiection: but at this time principally he ſtood confirmed in his ancient counſell, for as much as by peace, he ſhould be the better aſſured of the Realme of Nauarre, by him newly conquered; but much more for that ſince the death of Queene Iſabel, being no more King but Gouernour of Caſtile, he had not in troubleſome times ſo great and firme authoritie: a freſh example whereof he had ſeene in the defence of the Realme of Nauarre, whereof albeit he had a happie ſucceſſe, yet it happened

that by the ſlowneſſe of ſuccours he ſaw himſelfe brought into many dangers. Therefore to the end to fall no more into thoſe inconueniences, not knowing yet of the Popes death, he agreed to the truce, which neuertheleſſe was not publiſhed before he receiued newes of the election of a new Pope: and to iuſtifie himſelfe of this vnlooked for deliberation, he alledged, that the Pope and the Venetians had violated the league with him: for that ſince the battell of Rauenna they had neuer payed to him the fortie thouſand duckats, as they were bound whileſt the French king poſſeſſed any thing in Italy: That he only had bin carefull for the publike good of the Confederates, and had not chalenged to himſelfe the rewards of the common victory: That he did not poſſeſſe in Italy ſo much as one ſmall tower more then he had before the warre; but the Pope had ſought his particular benefite, and made proper to himſelfe the things that were common, ſeizing vpon Parma, Plaiſance and Reggia, and nouriſhing a continuall ſtudie to poſſeſſe Ferrara: which couetouſneſſe of his had bene the onely impediment of the recouering of the Caſtles in the Duchie of Millan and the Lanterne of Genes: That for his part, he had interpoſed all his diligence and authoritie to worke the accord betweene Cæſar and the Venetians, but the Pope for his proper intereſts had laboured to exclude them out of the league, wherein he ſaid his Embaſſadours had behaued themſelues vndiſcreetly, who not conſenting (for that they knew ſuch was his intention) that he ſhould be named in the head of the confederation, had ſuffered him to be named in that article wherein the Venetians were excluded. Moreouer, that in thoſe negociations and practiſes, the Venetians had not anſwered the opinion that men had of their wiſedome, holding Vincenſa in ſuch eſtimation, that for feare to loſe it they would not deliuer themſelues from the trauels of the warre: That it was impoſſible for him to maintaine the armie he had in Italy without the contributions promiſed, and much leſſe poſſible to ſuſtaine the whole warre vpon the confines of his realmes, a matter which he knew all the reſidue did deſire and procure: That the Pope could no more diſſemble his deſire and intention to take from him the kingdome of Naples: and yet that theſe iniuries could not moue him to haue a thought to abandon the Church and the other eſtates of Italy, if he might find in them a reaſonable correſpondencie to contract and capitulate with him for their common defence, which he hoped they would be moued vnto, the rather by the oportunitie and meanes of this truce. He cauſed to be inſerted in the inſtrument of the truce the names of Cæſar and the King of England, notwithſtanding he had nothing communicated with them: and this was a thing very ridiculous, that at the ſame time that the truce was ſolemnly publiſhed throughout all Spaine, an Herald came from the King of England, to ſignifie vnto him the great preparations which he made to inuade France, and to ſolicite him likewiſe to make warre againſt the King on the coaſts of Spaine, according to his promiſe. The truce made in this manner, amazed much the minds of ſuch in Italy to whom the iuriſdiction of the French was diſpleaſing, euery one holding it almoſt for certaine, that the French King would not deferre to ſend an army into Italy; and that for the obſtinacie of Cæſar touching the conditions of the peace, the Venetians would ioyne with the King, againſt whom being ioyned together, it ſeemed a very hard matter to make reſiſtance; for that the Spaniſh armie had now no more meanes to maintaine themſelues, notwithſtanding they had at times drawne ſome ſtore of money out of the eſtate of Millan, much afflicted with infinite expences. Touching the new Pope, men could not yet diſcerne what was his intention. He ſeemed to wiſh ſecretly that the power of the French King might be bounded by the Alpes; and yet being newly aſcended to the Popedome, and no leſſe confuſed then others for the truce made by the king Catholike, in a time whō men had greateſt expectation that he wold follow the war, his mind was full of doubt, & he was alſo angrie, for that demanding with great inſtance the reſtitution of Parma and Plaiſance to the Church, men were ready to giue him hope thereof, but the execution went ſlowly forward, all the others deſiring to preſerue them to the Duchie of Millan, and haply hoping that the deſire to recouer them, would induce him to the defence of that ſtate. The Swiſſers ſeemed to be a more certaine and a more mightie defence and ſuccour; but becauſe the ſummes of money, which according to the couenants were neceſſary to wage and leuie them, could not be aduanced neither by Maximilian Sforce nor the reſidue, it was feared, that in the greateſt neceſſitie they would refuſe to deſcend into the ſtate of Millan. On the other ſide, the French King, after he had finiſhed the truce, determined to ſend an armie into Italy, the reaſons afore recited giuing him great hope of the victory: whereunto was added, that he knew well enough that the peoples of the ſtate of Millan, vexed with ſo many taxes and rapines of the Swiſſers, and with the harbouring and payment to the Spaniards, deſired earneſtly to returne vnder his obedience; hauing found by the rude behauiour which others had vſed towards them, that in comparíſon the domination of the French was to be deſired; and particularly many Gentlemen by expreſſe letters, which they ſent, ſome to himſelfe, and others to Triuulce, whom the King had ſent to Lyons, the better to debate with them of Millan, perſwaded that he ſhould not deferre to ſend an armie, promiſing to take armes, and to declare themſelues for him as ſoone as his armie was paſſed the Mounts. And there was no want of continuall perſwaſions, as well of Triuulce, as of others that were baniſhed, who, according to the cuſtome of ſuch as be out of their countrey, alledged that the enterpriſe would be very eaſie, ſpecially the Venetians being brought to ioyne with him in the action. But that which enforced the King to make haſte, was the confidence he had to preuent with the end of that expedition, the beginning of the warre which the King of England meant to make vpon him, which he could not begin till after certaine moneths; for that that kingdome hauing now bene many yeares in peace, was diſfurniſhed of armour, of artilleries, and almoſt of all other things neceſſary for warre: and alſo in great want of horſes of ſeruice, for that the Engliſh do ordinarily make warre on foote: and their footmen being vnexperienced, the King of England was conſtrained for that he meant to paſſe into France with a mighty power, to entertain a great number of Almain footmen: matters which could not be diſpatched without great tract of time. The French King in like ſort was conſtrained to make the more haſte, for feare leſt the Caſtles ſhould be loſt for want of victuals, but ſpecially the Lanterne of Genes, which not many dayes before had miſſed to be relieued with victuals by a ſhip ſent for that purpoſe: which from Albinguo, whither it was accompanied with three ſhips and one gallion, being entred the maine ſea with a good wind, had by the force thereof paſſed through the midſt of the Genoways fleet, and being approched neare the Lanterne, and riding at anker, had faſtened her cables to the Caſtle, and began already to vnlade her victuals and munitions which ſhe had brought, at what time Andrew Doria, who afterwards was ſo happie and famous by ſea, thruſting in with no ſmall danger with a great ſhip, whereof he was the owner, betweene the Lanterne and the French ſhip, when he had cut a ſunder the cable that was faſtened to the Caſtle, and the cables that held the ankers, fighting valiantly, and receiuing a wound in his face, he tooke the ſhip. The King therefore being determined not to deferre the beginning of the warre, to which intent, and to be ready vpon all occaſions, he had already ſent many lances into Burgundie and Daulphiney, he thought good to hearken with diligence after thoſe things which now had bene debated ſo many moneths with the Venetians, the which had bene ſomewhat deferred and protracted as well by the one as by the other partie, for that ſometimes the hope to haue peace with Cæſar, and ſometimes the great inſtance made by the Venetians for Cremona and Guiaradadda, had holden the King in ſuſpence: and in the Senate the opiniions were found diuers, for that many of great authoritie in that Commonweale, preferred the accord with Cæſar, ſhewing that it was more profitable for them to auoide for the preſent ſuch huge expences, and to free themſelues from dangers, thereby to be the more ready to embrace the occaſions that would be offered, then, their Commonweale being ſo ouer-wearied and trauelled, and the wealth of priuate men abated, to intangle themſelues with new warres in company of the French King, of whoſe amitie, how faithfull and aſſured it was, they were not without a late experience. Neuertheleſſe, for that it ſeemed to the greater part that rarely ſuch an occaſion would preſent it ſelfe as might giue them the meanes to recouer their ancient eſtate, and that the agreement with Cæſar (he retaining Verona) would not deliuer them from troubles and dangers, they reſolued (without ſpeaking any more of Cremona and Guiaradadda) to make confederation with the French King, which was concluded in the Kings Court by Andrew Gritti, who enioyed already rather the place of an Embaſſadour then of a priſoner; and wherein, after it was granted that Bartholomew Aluiano and Andrew Gritti ſhould be ſet at liberty, the Venetians were bound to aide the King with eight hundred men at armes, fifteene hundred light horſemen, and ten thouſand footmen, againſt all ſuch as would riſe vp to let him for recouering of Aſt, of Genes, and the Duchie of Millan: and the King bound himſelfe to ioyne with them vntill they had recouered all that they poſſeſſed in Lombardie and the Marque of Treuiſana afore the league of Cambray. As ſoone as the confederation was reſolued, Iohn Iaques Triuulce and Bartholomew Aluiano went to Suſa: the one, to go from thence to Venice

by the ſurer way, and the other to aſſemble there the army appointed for the warre, which conſiſted of fifteene hundred lances, eight hundred light horſemen, and fifteene thouſand footmen, whereof eight thouſand were Lanceknights, and the reſidue French men, all vnder the gouernment of Monſieur Trimouille, whom the King had appointed his Lieutenant, to the end that matters might proceed with the more reputation.

At this time the French King made great ſute to the Pope with earneſt prayers not to hinder him in recouering the Duchie of Millan, offering him not onely not to paſſe further after the victory, but alſo to make peace alwayes as it ſhould ſeeme beſt vnto him. To which motions albeit the Pope gaue eare very graciouſly, and that, to the end there might the more credite be giuen to his words, he vſed the helpe of Iulian his brother to treate with the French King, yet many things made him ſuſpected to the King: as the memory of things done afore the time of his Papacie: then, ſince he was Pope, how he had ſent to him Cinthio his familiar friend with letters and very friendly commiſſions, but ſo generall, as they diſcouered that his mind was not inclined to him: and that he had conſented that Proſper Colonno ſhould be elected Gouernour of the Duchie of Millan; a matter which Pope Iulius had alwayes hindred, for the hatred he bare to the Colonnois. He entred alſo into greater doubt, for that the Pope had ſignified to the King of England, that he would continue in the confederation made with Caſar, the King Catholike and himſelfe: and afterwards he wrote to the Communalties of the Swiſſers, in a maner exhorting them to the defence of Italy, and diſſembled not his willingneſſe to continue with them the confederation made by Pope Iulius, by the which they were bound to the defence of the eſtate Eccleſiaſtike, receiuing of him a yearly penſion of twentie thouſand duckats. It was alſo a ſigne of his will and intention, that he had not receiued into grace the Duke of Ferrara, but by many excuſes deferred to render to him Reggia vntill his brother the Cardinall came to Rome, who to auoide the perſecutions of Pope Iulius, and the inſtance which the French King made vnto him to go to the Councell of Piſa, was withdrawne to his Biſhopricke of Agria in the countrey of Hungaria. But that which aboue all other things made the King enter into ſuſpition of the Pope, was, that he had (although very ſecretly) counſelled the Senate of Venice to accord with Caſar: a matter cleane contrary to the intention of the King, who had alſo taken in ill part, that the Pope pretending that he was not moued for any other cauſe then for that which concerned his office, had written vnto him a Briefe, wherein he exhorted him not to take armes, and to make it appeare, that he deſired rather to finiſh the warre with ſome honorable compoſition: a matter which the King would not haue diſliked, if for the ſame deſire of peace, the Pope had declared to the King of England, that he ought not make war vpon the Realme of France. And certainly this ſuſpition of the King was not without cauſe, for that the Pope earneſtly deſired that the French might haue no more footing in Italy; either for that he thought it more profitable for the common ſuretie, or for the greatneſſe of the Church: or for that he kept ſtill fixed in his mind the remembrance of harmes receiued by the Crowne of France, whereunto albeit his father and other his predeceſſors had borne no litle affection, and in ſundry accidents had reaped many honours and profites; yet it was an iniury freſh in memory, that his brethren and he had bene expulſed Florence by the coming of King Charles, and that the King reigning bearing fauour to the popular gouernment, had either alwayes deſpiſed them, or if at any time he ſhewed himſelfe affected to them, it was to vſe them as inſtruments to draw the Florentines by that ſuſpition to couenants more aduantagious for himſelfe, without hauing any care at all of them. To this perhaps was added, a diſdaine, for that he had bin led priſoner to Millan after the battell of Rauenna, and that the King had commanded that he ſhould be brought into France. But although the Pope was thus affected, either for theſe or for other cauſes, yet he proceeded aduiſedly, and diſſembled as much as he could his intention, perceiuing himſelfe not of abilitie to make ſuch reſiſtance as he could haue wiſhed, and he gaue eare dayly with great affection to the demands and complaints which were made vnto him againſt the King. For the Swiſſers being much inclined to riſe for the defence of the Duchie of Millan, offered to deſcend thither with a farre greater number then before, if they might be furniſhed with a certaine ſumme of money, which for the pouertie and weakneſſe of others could not be expected from any but from the Pope. Touching the Viceroy, his counſels were vncertaine, and his ſpeeches variable and ſecret, for ſometime he offered the Pope to oppoſe againſt the French men, if he would ſhew himſelf openly in the cauſe, ſending his bands of ſoldiers to ioyne with him, and waging for three moneths a good number of footmen; and to adde the more credite to his doings, he tooke his ſouldiers from the Cities of Parma and Reggia, and incamped with his army vpon the riuer of Trebia, leauing notwithſtanding ſome of his ſouldiers for the guard of Tortona and Alexandria, who had not ſtirred from thence: ſometimes alſo he auouched that he had receiued commandement from his King (at the ſame time that he wrote to him of the truce) to leade backe the armie to the kingdome of Naples. But Ierome Vich Embaſſadour reſident with the Pope, vſed other ſpeeches, and yet he agreed with him in this, that his King promiſed, the Pope taking vpon him the defence of Millan, to begin the warre in France without any reſpect to the truce, which he ſaid he might lawfully do without any violation of his faith promiſed. Therefore it was beleeued of many, that the King Catholike, fearing that by reaſon of the truce that had bene made, no man would oppoſe againſt the French King, had commanded the Viceroy, that if he ſaw none would proceed roundly to the defence of the Duchie of Millan, that he ſhould not ſeeke to prouoke the French King by new iniuries, but ſhould retire his army to Naples: for which cauſe alſo he made ſhew to the King that he was content to incline to peace, offering withall to induce Cæſar and the King of England thereto. And to make him the more tractable if he ſhould recouer the Duchie of Millan, he made almoſt an aſſured promiſe, that his army ſhould be no impediment to him. The Viceroy then who had determined to go his way, reuoked the ſouldiers that were vnder the Marquis of Peſquiero in Alexandria and Tortona, communicating at the ſame time (as was ſaid) his reſolution to Triuulce, to the end his departing might be more acceptable to the French King. Neuertheles he put not this deliberation ſo ſpeedily in execution, for that the Swiſſers being very deſirous to defend the Duchie of Millan, had ſent thither by common conſent fiue thouſand footmen, and gaue hope to ſend a farre greater number: but making demonſtration of the contrary, he ſent Proſper Colonno to debate with the Swiſſers of the place where they ſhould aſſemble againſt the French, either for that he had receiued aduertiſement that the truce was diſcontenting to Cæſar, or for that he was enioyned by new commiſſions from his King to follow the will of the Pope, who perſeuered ſtill in the ſame perplexities (his ſmall hope on the one ſide, and his owne inclination on the other, ſtriuing in him.) And yet notwithſtanding the Swiſſers being come vpon the territories of Tortona, where Proſper had ſignified vnto them that the Viceroy would come and ioyne with them, interpoſing many excuſes, he required them to come vpon the lands of Trebia to ioyne with him. By which maner of ſolicitation, they perceiuing the difference that was betweene his will and his words, anſwered reſolutely, That the Viceroy made not this demand to the end to go looke his enemies in the face, but to turne his backe with more ſafetie: and that it was a matter of no importance to the Swiſſers, to whom it was all one, whether he feared to fight with the French men, whether he taried ſtill, whether he marched, or whether he fled, for that they onely were ſufficient to defend the Duchie of Millan againſt all men.

The French men in the Duchie of Millan.

But now was all the countrey in a mutinie, and the Count Muſſocquo ſonne to Iohn Iaques was got into Aſt without any impediment, and after into Alexandria; and the French men which were departed from Suſa marched with great diligence. The Duke of Millan who was come ſomewhat too late to enter Alexandria, ioyned himſelfe to the Swiſſers neare Tortona, where being giuen to vnderſtand by the Viceroy, that he was determined to go his way, they drew towards Nouaro. The inhabitants of Millan at the bruite of the departing of the Viceroy, ſent Embaſſadours to Nouaro to excuſe them to their Duke, for that hauing none to defend them, they compounded with the French men, to the end to auoide vtter ruine; who declared that he willingly accepted their excuſe, and alſo commended them for their charitable care of the ſafetie of their common countrey. Vpon this occaſion Sacromoro Viſcount to whom was appointed the beſieging of the Caſtle of Millan, turned to the French, and reuictualled the Caſtle which he was ſent to batter. The Viceroy then brake vp from Trebia with all his armie, conſiſting of twelue hundred men at armes and eight thouſand footmen, to returne to the kingdom of Naples, as though the affaires of Lombardie being deſperate, he had bene carefull onely of his ſafetie: but receiuing the ſame day in the way betweene Plaiſance and Florenzola letters from Rome, he cauſed immediatly the Enſignes to march backe againe, and came to the ſame lodging from whence he was departed. The cauſe was, that the Pope, to whom almoſt at the ſame time were rendred Plaiſance and Parma, determining to proue if the Duchie of Millan might be defended by the helpe of the Swiſſers, gaue very ſecretly to Ierome Moron the Dukes

Embaſſadour reſident in his Court, fortie thouſand duckats to ſend to the Swiſſers: but with this pretext, that if the matter came to the knowledge of others, he ſhould giue out, that twentie thouſand of them were vpon the account of their yearely penſions, and the other twentie thouſand to ſatisfie the three Cantons, who pretended the ſame to be due to them by his predeceſſor, who had alwayes refuſed to pay them. For the returning of the Viceroy to Trebia, together with a bruite of the deſcending of the new companies of Swiſſers, the Millanois repenting their great haſte, gaue hope to Maximilian Sforce, that they would be ready to returne to his obedience, whenſoeuer they ſaw the Swiſſers and the Spaniſh armie ioyne together in the field. And the more to nouriſh them in theſe hopes, the Viceroy, with whom was Proſper Colonno, raiſed a bridge vpon Po, promiſing from time to time to paſſe ouer, but neuer putting it in effect, for that hauing a ſpeciall care to ſaue his armie, he determined to proceed according to the euent of things; and held it very dangerous to haue the French men in his face, and the Venetian armie at his backe, who hauing already taken the Citie of Cremona, and caſt a bridge at Cana vpon Po, were not farre from him. Bartholomew Aluiano was gone from Suſa to Venice, fetching a great circuite: where after he had in open Councell, without any contradiction, caſt vpon the Count Petillano the fault of the ouerthrow of Guiaradadda, & ſpoken very proudly of the preſent warre, he was by the Senate choſen Captaine generall of their armie, vnder the ſame conditions that the Count Petillano had obtained that degree, and haply on the very ſame day whereon foure yeares before he fell into the power of his enemies: ſo often doth fortune laugh at the ignorance of mortall men. As ſoone as he was choſen Generall, he went to the armie which was muſtering at S. Boniface vpon the territories of Verona, and Theodore Triuulce was with him as Lieutenant to the French King, with whom he approched with great diligence to the gates of Verona, the ſelfe ſame day that the French armie parted from Suſa: for that in that Citie there were ſome who had conſpired to receiue him in: but the day after, fiue hundred Lanceknights entred Verona by the riuer of Adice, and the conſpiracie being diſcouered, Aluiano hauing loſt all hope to preuaile, determined, contrary to the authoritie of the Venetian Aſſiſtant, to draw towards the riuer of Po, to ſtop the Spaniards, or according to the occurrence of things, to ioyne with the French armie: and he imparted not this deliberation to the Senate vntill he was gone from Verona one baite; for that notwithſtanding he alledged, that the euent of the whole warre depended on the ſucceſſe of the affaires of Millan, wherein if fortune ſhould be aduerſe to the French, whatſoeuer ſhould be attempted or obtained in any other place would be but in vaine and not durable, and therefore it was neceſſary by all poſſible meanes, to make the French King victorious: yet he feared (and not without cauſe) leſt the Senate would be againſt it, not ſo much for the deſire he had that there ſhould be a care had firſt to recouer Verona and Breſſia, as for that certaine other of the Captaines allowed not that they ſhould paſſe the riuer of Mincia, vnleſſe they had firſt more particular knowledge of the proceedings of the French: wherein they ſhewed, in caſe of any inconuenience, how hard it would be to retire in ſafetie, hauing to paſſe by the confines of Verona and Mantua, countries either in ſubiection or at the deuotion of Cæſar. Valeggia and the towne of Peſquiero, fearing the threats of Aluiano, yeelded themſelues to him, by whoſe example alſo the Caſtle-keeper gaue vp the Rocke, receiuing a ſmall ſumme of mony, as well for himſelfe, as for certaine Lanceknights that were therein. About the ſame time certaine of the chiefe men of the Mountaine, entred into Breſſia in fauour of the Venetians with a great ſtrength of paiſants: and yet Aluiano, although he was intreated of the Breſſian Embaſſadours which came to him at Gambaro, and deſired by the Venetian Aſſiſtant, could not be brought to conſent to go thither and remaine there onely one day, to recouer the Caſtle that was kept in the name of the Viceroy, ſo great was his deſire to follow his firſt deliberation without intermiſſion. With which celeritie being come to the gates of Cremona, he found that at the ſame time Galeas Paluiſin (called by certain of Cremona) was entred in fauour of the French King, but being vnwilling that any other ſhould participate with him in the glory of that action, he brake & ſpoiled his bands of ſoldiers, and entring the towne, ſtripped Cæſar Fieramoſquo that was left there in garriſon with three hundred horſe and fiue hundred footmen by the Duke of Millan. And it behoued him not to loſe time to recouer the Caſtle, for that it had bene alwayes holden by the French King, and reuictualled a litle before by Ranſe de Cere: who (as he returned to Crema, where he was appointed Gouernour) brake a troupe of two hundred horſemen of Alexander Sforce, which he encountred at Serzana. From thence Aluiano incamping at Caua vpon Po with the bridge made to paſſe ouer, kept not his ſouldiers from doing ſome inſolencies vpon the lands of the Pope. He went afterwards to Piſqueton, hauing already becauſe of the mutation of Cremona, Soncino, Loda, and other places thereabouts, ſet vp the French Enſignes. But afore, as ſoone as he had recouered Cremona, he had ſent Ranſe de Cere to Breſſia with part of the men of warre, to aſſure that Citie, and to recouer the Caſtle, but much more to hinder the good ſucceſſe of the Almaines: for that almoſt as ſoone as he was retired from before Cremona, Rocandolph Captaine of the Lanceknights, and with him Federike Gonſaguo de Boſſolo iſſuing out of Verona with ſixe hundred horſe and two thouſand footmen, were gone to S. Boniface, where Aluiano had left vnder Sigiſmund Cauallo and Iohn Fortin, three hundred light horſemen and ſixe hundred footmen: who being ſcattered in the countrey without any military diſcipline, hearing of the coming of the enemies, were fled to Colorgno, where the Lanceknights following them, entred the towne by force, and making them all priſoners, they ſacked and burnt the towne. They did the like afterwards to Soaue, breaking downe the bridge which the Venetians had made vpon Adice: and had with the ſame furie gotten Vincenſa, if a very great companie of paiſants had not ſuddenly entred therein: which maner of proceeding was ſo much the more feared, by how much the bruite ranne, that there came to Verona new ſupplies of footmen out of Tyrol.

Genes at the deuotion of the French.

About this time the French nauie containing nine light galleys and certain other veſſels, drew neare to Genes; and Anthonie and Ierome brethren of the houſe of the Adornes, approched by land with the fauour of thoſe of the Riuers that held their faction, and with other bands of ſouldiers that had bene leuied with the Kings money: which they did, puſhed on by a great occaſion, by reaſon of a diſcord hapned a litle before betweene the Fieſquois and the Duke of Genes, with whom they were at firſt confederate againſt the family of the Adornes: and the matter fell out, for that either for ſome quarrell that hapned by chance, or for ſome ſuſpition, Ierome the ſonne of Iohn Lewis de Fieſquo, coming out of the publike Pallace, was ſlaine by Lodowike and Fregoſin, the Dukes brethren: for which iniurie, Othobon and Sinibald his brethren, retiring themſelues to their country-houſes, and ſhortly after hauing contracted with the French King, and conſpired with the Adornes, they approched neare to Genes by another way, accõpanied with foure thouſand footmen. The Duke was not mightie enough of himſelfe to make reſiſtance againſt the Fieſquois and Adorneis ioyned together, neither by reaſon of the diligence of his aduerſaries, could the ſuccours which he had demanded of the Viceroy arriue in time: and that which wholy put him downe, was, that a thouſand of his footmen, who were poſſeſſed of the mountains neare the towne, being not able to reſiſt a greater number, were ouerthrowne; ſo that the Duke together with Fregoſin, hauing ſcarce leiſure to ſaue his owne life, fled away by ſea, leauing Lodowike his other brother to guard the Caſtle: and the victors entred Genes, where the brethren of the family of Fieſquo, caried with a furious deſire of reuenge, cruelly cauſed Zacharie the Dukes brother to be ſlaine, and after to be tied to a horſe taile, and drawne through the Citie, who had bene taken in the encounter vpon the mountaines, and was preſent with the others at the ſlaughter of their brother. Thus Genes being reduced to the deuotion of the French King, Anthonie Adornei was created Gouernour in the name of the King, and the French nauie furniſhed the Lanterne with men and victuals, and afterwards hauing ſacked Spetia, roade at Portouenere. There remained no more but Nouaro and Coma, of an abſolute recouery of all thoſe eſtates which the King had loſt the yeare before: for theſe two Cities onely in all the Duchie of Millan, held as yet in the name of Maximilian Sforce.

Nouaro beſieged by the French.

But the glorie of this warre was deſtinated, to the great infamie of all others, not to the French men, nor to the Almaine footmen, nor to the Spaniſh regiments, nor to the Venetian bands; but to the Swiſſers onely, againſt whom the French armie (hauing left ſufficient garriſon within Alexandria to aſſure the places beyond Po) drew neare to Nouaro, boaſting of their happie ſucceſſes, of the confeſſion euen of their enemies, who had incloſed themſelues within wals, and of the manifeſt feare of the Spaniards. Beſides this, there was preſented to the memory of men, as it were a certaine image and repreſentation of things paſt: That this was the ſame Nouaro wherein Lodowike Sforce father to the preſent Duke had bene made priſoner: That in the French campe were the ſame Captaines, Monſieur Trimouille and Iohn Iaques Triuulce: and ſome of the ſame Enſignes and Captaines of thoſe Cantons, which in another warre had ſold

the father, did now accompanie the ſonne in this warre: by reaſon whereof Monſieur Trimouille had proudly written to the King, that he would ſend to him priſoner the ſonne, from the ſame place where he had deliuered into captiuitie the father. The French men violently beat vpon the walls of Nouaro with their artilleries, but in a place of no leſſe difficultie then danger to deſcend into the towne: and the Swiſſers ſeemed to haue ſo litle feare of their valour, that they would neuer ſuffer that gate of the towne that was towards the campe to be ſhut. After the artilleries had beaten to the earth a ſufficient ſpace of the wall, the armie without prepared furiouſly to the aſſault, but finding a valiant reſiſtance, and vnderſtanding they did preſently expect Altoſaſzo a Captaine of great renowne with a farre greater ſupply, they doubted of the ſucceſſe of the enterpriſe, which made them the day following to retire two miles from the wals of Nouaro, hoping afterwards to carry the victorie more by the diſorders and wants of the enemies, then by the furie of their armes. But theſe hopes were made vaine by the reſolute mind of Motin one of the Swiſſers Captaines, who calling together all the bands of ſouldiers vpon the market place of Nouaro, encouraged them with words full of reſolution, that without tarrying for the ſuccours of Altoſaſzo, who was to arriue the day following, they ſhould iſſue out and ſet vpon their enemies in their campe, and not ſuffer the glory and victory which they might appropriate to themſelues, to become common, or rather wholly transferred to others: for that as things that follow draw vnto them ſuch as go afore, and the increaſing of any thing couereth the part that is augmented; ſo the merite and praiſe of this warre would not be caſt vpon them, but vpon the ſupplies that came after. By how much (ſaid he) the enterpriſe may ſeeme more hard and perillous, by ſo much ſhall it be found more eaſie and ſure; for that the more accidents are ſudden and vnexpected, the more do they terrifie and amaze men. The French men doubt nothing leſſe at this time then to be charged by vs, and whereas they are newly incamped this very day, they cannot but ſuffer diſorder, the place being neither intrenched nor fortified. The French men were neuer wont to haue the courage to fight if they had not of our men among them; and though of late they haue aduentured to fight without vs, yet neuer againſt vs. How much will they then be aſtoniſhed when they ſhall ſee themſelues furiouſly charged vpon the ſudden, by thoſe whoſe vertue and reſolution was wont to encourage and aſſure them? Let not their horſemen and artilleries trouble you, ſince we haue had many experiences heretofore what confidence they repoſe in thoſe things againſt vs. Gaſton de Foix who was ſo braue a Captaine, notwithſtanding he was ſtrong in multitudes of lances and cannons, did not he alwayes ſuffer vs to paſſe by him along the plaines when we deſcended (two yeares ſithens) euen to the gates of Millan, we being no otherwiſe armed then with pikes? They haue now with them many bands of Lanceknights, but that doth ſo much the more encourage me, ſeeing we haue at one time an occaſion to ſhew to him who with ſo great couetouſneſſe and ingratitude hath contemned our trauels and our bloud, that he neuer made a worſe reſolution, either for himſelfe or for his Realme: and to manifeſt to thoſe that thinke the emploiment and ſeruice of their perſons to be ſufficient to make vs periſh for hunger, that the Lanceknights are not equall to the Swiſſers, and albeit they haue the ſame language and forme of diſcipline with vs, yet they haue neither the ſame valour nor the ſame reſolution. All the difficultie will be to winne their artillery, and yet this ſhall make it eaſie; that it is not planted in a place fortified; that our inuaſion is ſudden, and fauoured with the darkneſſe of the night; and aſſailing it furiouſly, it cannot endomage vs but for a very ſhort time, which yet will be interrupted by tumult, diſorder, and ſudden confuſion. Touching other things, they will be very eaſie to vs, for their horſemen dare not aduenture vpon our pikes, and much leſſe will their vile troupes of French footmen and Gaſcons enter skirmiſh with vs: ſo that taking ſuch a deliberation, we ſhall make no leſſe proofe of our wiſedomes then of our valour. Our nation is of ſuch reputation, that the glorie of our name cannot be preſerued but by attempting ſome matter beyond the common expectation and vſage of all men: and ſince we are about Nouaro, the place it ſelfe admoniſheth vs, that we can in no other ſort quench the ancient infamie we got here in the pay of Lodowike Sforce. Let vs proceed then in the name of the great God, the perſecutor of ſchiſmatikes, excommunicate perſons, and the enemies to his name: let vs march on to a victorie no leſſe eaſie then aſſured (if we ſhew our ſelues men,) whereby our name ſhall be made ſo much the more great and glorious, by how much the danger ſeemeth more euident: and by how much our enemies doe exceede vs in number, by ſo much the more ſhall we

we be enriched by their ſpoiles. At theſe ſpeeches of Motin all the bands of ſouldiers began to giue a great ſhout, euery one approuing his deuice by holding vp their hands: and then, aſſuring them of the victory, he commanded them to go to reſt, and to prepare themſelues to fall into array when the drum ſhould ſtrike. The nation of Swiſſers neuer made a more braue or more reſolute deliberation, being but a few againſt many, without horſemen, and without artilleries, againſt an armie well furniſhed and moſt mightie in that kind: and withall being not puſhed forward by any neceſſitie, for ẏ Nouaro was deliuered frō danger, and they expected the day after a great ſtrength of ſouldiers. They rather choſe this way, wherein the ſuretie was leſſe and the hope of glory greater; then that, wherein for greater ſafetie there might happen to them leſſe glorie. Therfore the ſixt day of Iune after midnight they iſſued out of Nouaro with great furie, being in number about ten thouſand men, who were ſo diſtributed and diſpoſed, that ſeuen thouſand were appointed to charge the artillerie, about which the Lanceknights were lodged, & ẏ reſidue were to be beſtowed with their pikes aduāced againſt the men at armes. The French men, for the ſhortneſſe of the time, and becauſe they doubted not that ſuch an accident ſhould befall them ſo ſoone, had made no fortification of their campe: and at the firſt tumult and alarme that the ſentinels made of the coming of the enemies, the ſuddenneſſe of the aduenture, and the darkneſſe of the night, increaſed much their feare and confuſion; yet the men at armes drew forthwith into ſtrength, and preſented themſelues in battel-ray, and the Lanceknights who were followed with the other bands of footmen, fell preſently into order. Now the artillery ſhot off with great noiſe againſt the Swiſſers that came to aſſaile it, and endomaged them much, ſtrewing the place with many of them, which was rather knowne by the crying & howling of men then by the benefite of the eyes, the vſe whereof was taken away by the darkneſſe of the night: and yet with a deſperate reſolution, deſpiſing preſent death, and nothing diſcouraged with the fortune of thoſe that lay ſlaine at their feete, nor once breaking their order for all this, they ranne as faſt as they could vpon the artillerie: and being come to it, the Lanceknights and they encountred together with a maruellous furie, the one fighting againſt the other with great rage, and much more for hatred and the deſire of glorie. There might haue bene ſeene (for now the Sunne began to ſhew) ſometimes one ſide to yeeld, ſometimes the other: oftentimes that part to ſeeme to preuaile which earſt was thought to haue the worſt: on the ſame ſide, and at the ſame time, the one battell to ſway, and the other to aduance; one part to inuade their enemies furiouſly, & the other to reſiſt hardly; all things on all ſides full of dead bodies, wounded men, and bloud: ſometimes the Captaines would valiantly performe the office of ſouldiers, both charging their enemies and defending themſelues and theirs, and ſometimes they would diſcreetly manage the place of Captaines, encouraging, prouiding, ſuccouring, relieuing, and commanding. On the other ſide, where the men of armes ſtood, they were very calme, without doing any thing; for that the authority, the perſwaſions, the commandements, the prayers, the exclamations, and threatnings of Triuulce and Trimouille, preuailing nothing with the horſemen, whoſe minds were already made timorous, they had not the courage to charge their enemies that were before them: & it ſufficed the Swiſſers to keep them impaled in their ranks, to the end they ſhould not ſuccour their footmen. At laſt in ſo great a hardineſſe and valour of ſuch as fought, the vertue of the Swiſſers preuailed, who hauing victoriouſly wonne the artilleries, turned them vpon their enemies, whom they put to flight as well by that meanes as by their owne valour. To the flying of the footmen was ioyned the running away of the men at armes, who ſhewed no valour, nor did any thing worthy of praiſe. Only the Lord Robert la March carried with the vehement affection of a father, entred the battell of the Swiſſers with a ſquadron of horſemen, to reſcue Fiorango and Iames his ſonnes, Captaines of the Lanceknights, who lay ſore wounded on the earth, and fought with ſuch furie, that the Swiſſers themſelues maruelled much that he could draw them aliue out of that danger. The battell continued about two houres, to the great hurt of both the parties. There was ſlaine of the Swiſſers about fifteene hundred bodies, amongſt whom was Captaine Motin, the firſt mouer of that ſo glorious a counſell, who fighting valiantly, was thruſt through the throate with a pike. But farre greater was the ſlaughter of the enemies, of whom ſome ſay were left dead ten thouſand carkaſſes: the moſt part of the Lanceknights died in fighting, and the greateſt ſlaughter of the French and Gaſcon footmen, was in flying. Almoſt all the horſemen went away in ſafetie, the Swiſſers being not able to follow them, who if they had had horſemen, might haue broken them eaſily,

The deſcriptiō of a furious conflict.

The French men defeated by the Swiſſers

eaſily,retiring as they did in great feare. All the baggage became a prey to the victors, with two and twentie peeces of great artillerie, and all the horſes aſſigned for the ſeruice of the ſame. The victors returned the ſame day into Nouaro almoſt triumphantly, and with ſuch renowne through the world, that in reſpect of the magnanimitie of their enterpriſe, the euident deſpiſing of death, the reſolution they ſhewed in the fight, and the happie ſucceſſe of the ſame,there were many that durſt preferre this action, afore almoſt all the memorable things which we reade to haue bene done by the Greekes and Romanes. The French men fled into Piemont, from whence (Triuulce loſing time to crie after them) they paſſed ſpeedily into France.

The victorie obtained, Millan with the other places that were declared for the French, ſent to demand pardon, which was granted them, vpon condition to disburſe a great ſumme of money: the inhabitants of Millan two hundred thouſand duckats, and the reſidue euery one according to his abilitie,to be all giuen to the Swiſſers,to whom was rightly due,as wel the gain as the glorie of the victorie, gotten with their valour and with their bloud: and who, to draw all the fruite they could,entred afterwards into the Marquiſdome of Montferrat and into Piemont, charging thoſe countries to haue receiued the French army: and there, partly by pillage, and partly by ranſoming the poore people (yet without attempting any thing againſt the life and honour of any) they got much. The Spaniards alſo were not altogether depriued of the profits of the victorie, for that Ianus lately chaſed out of Genes, and Octauian Fregoſo (both which aſpired to be Duke) being retired to the Viceroy after the battell, the Viceroy preferring Octauian, for whom the Pope did what he could in regard of their ancient amitie, and withall receiuing his promiſe to pay him fiftie thouſand duckats when he ſhould be poſſeſſed of Genes, he deliuered him three thouſand footmen vnder the Marquis of Peſquiero, and for his owne part,he went with the reſidue of the armie to Chieſteggio, making ſemblance to paſſe further if need required. But as the Marquis and Octauian drew neare to Genes, the brethren of the family of Adorno,knowing their owne weakneſſe, went their way; and Octauian entring in,was created Duke of that Citie, which in the courſe of a yeare had for gouernours the French men, Ianus Fregoſo,the Adorneis, and Octauian. Bartlemew Aluiano hearing of the ouerthrow giuen to the French army,feared leſt he ſhould be preſently followed by the Spaniards,and retired in all haſte to Pontuiquo, leauing in the way (for loſing of time) certaine peeces of artillery, which could not ſo ſuddenly march.From Pontuiquo when he had left Ranſe de Cere in Crema,and abandoned Breſſia, for that it was not profitable to diminiſh the army, wherein were remaining ſixe hundred men at armes,a thouſand light horſemen, and fiue thouſand footmen, marching with the ſame celeritie,and with ſo great feare and disfauour of the country, that if but a ſmall company had followed them, they would of themſelues haue fallen into diſorder; he went to Tomba,neare to Adice, neuer ſtaying in any place longer then the neceſſitie to refreſh his men and horſes conſtrained him. When he ſaw the feare ouerpaſſed,ſince no man followed him,he ſtayd at Tomba, and there he gaue order to conuey to Padua and to Treuiſa the greateſt prouiſion of victuals that he could draw from the territories of Verona: and at the ſame time he ſent Iohn Paul Baillon to Legnaguo with threeſcore men at armes, and twelue hundred footmen, who being immediatly receiued by the inhabitants of the towne where was no garriſon,he gaue aſſault to the Rock which was guarded by an hundred and fiftie footmen, part Spaniſh and part Lanceknights, hauing firſt battered it with the artillery on that ſide that is towards the market place: in which aſſault,I know not which had more force,either valour or fortune, for that during the fight, the fire by aduenture faſtening vpon the munitions, by meanes of certaine inſtruments of artificiall fires throwne by thoſe that were without, part of the Rocke was burned: and in this tumult the footmen that gaue the aſſault being entred ſome at the breach, and ſome by ladders, tooke their Captaine,who was a Spaniard, and killed and tooke priſoners all the reſidue that were therein. Legnaguo being taken, Aluiano cauſed to build a bridge vpon Adice, and afterwards certaine inhabitants of Verona giuing him hope that they would mutine againſt the Almaines, he went to incampe at the village of S. Iohn,which is foure miles from Verona; and from whence the morning following,approching neare to the gate called S. Maximo, he planted his artilleries with great furie againſt the tower of the gate and the wall ioyning to it, expecting in the meane while if there would riſe any tumult in the towne: and after he had brought to the earth about fortie fadomes of the wall, beſides the tower, which fell in ſuch ſort, that the ruines ſerued for a very ſtrong rampier to the gate, he gaue a very furious aſſault. But there were within Verona

three hundred horſemen and three thouſand Lanceknights vnder Roccandolph a Captaine much eſteemed, who defended themſelues valiantly, beſides that the breach that was made in the wall, was a good height frō the gound within; and they of Verona ſtirred not, according to the hopes that were giuen: ſo that Aluiano perceiuing the difficultie to take it, retired his footmen from the wals, and had already begun to withdraw the artillery, when changing counſel in a moment, as was ſuppoſed, by a certaine meſſage which he receiued from the towne, he cauſed his footmen to returne to the walls, and recontinued the aſſault with a greater fury then before. But he found ſtill the ſame difficulties, and thoſe that had called him ſo ſlow and remiſſe, that hauing loſt at the aſſault more then two hundred of his people, amongſt whom was Thomas Fabro of Rauenna, Marſhall of his footmen, he began to deſpaire wholly of the victory, and retiring his artillery with great diligence, he returned the ſame day to the lodging from whence he was departed in the morning, hauing gained no credit that day, either for his counſell, or the iſſue thereof, but his great diligence was much praiſed throughout all Italy, for that in one day he had done that, which hardly other Captaines are wont to do in three or foure dayes. After this he ſpoiled the country, aſſaying if by that feare he could conſtraine the inhabitants of Verona to come to accord. But the Spaniſh army being now come on, for that the Viceroy after he heard of the loſſe of Legnaguo, fearing leſt by the ill diſpoſition of the townesmen, Verona would ſet open her gates to the Venetians, determined to giue preſent ſuccours to the affaires of Cæſar, hauing now no impediment, ſith the affaires of Genes had happily ſucceeded. Therefore after he had paſſed without difficultie the riuer of Po at Stradella, and that the Cities of Bergamo and Breſſia were rendred to him without reſiſtance, together with the towne of Peſquiero, he incamped before the Caſtle, that was manned with two hundred and fiftie footmen: the which although the common opinion was, that it might haue holden out yet certaine dayes, came by force into his power, the Venetian Ruler being made priſoner, and all the reſidue of the ſouldiers that were not ſlaine at the aſſault. Becauſe of the approch of the Spaniards, Aluiano retired to Alberè on the other ſide of Adice, and called to refurniſh his army as much as he could, not only certaine bands of footmen which were at Poleſina de Rouigna, but thoſe alſo whom he had left within Legnaguo: and a litle after the Lanceknights being ioyned at S. Martin with the Viceroy, alſo after the recouery of Legnaguo went to Montagnana, the Venetians who held no more in that quarter but Padua and Treuiſa, caring for no other thing then the preſeruation of thoſe Cities, ordained that the army ſhould be diſtributed in them, and that Iohn Paul Baillon, with whom were Malateſta de Sogliano and the Knight de la Volpe, ſhould be beſtowed in Treuiſa with two hundred men at armes, three hundred light horſemen, and two thouſand footmen, Aluiano remaining in Padua with the reſidue of the army: who taking care to fortifie it, by repairing the baſtillions, and giuing perfection to many things that were vnperfect, cauſed likwiſe to raze all the houſes, and cut downe all the trees that were within three miles about Padua, to make more hard & dangerous the approch of the enemies, and to cauſe them to haue need of many pioners.

The Pope ſeeks to appeaſe the King.

But whileſt that matters of warre proceeded in this ſort, the Pope trauelled with great induſtrie to weed out of the Church the diuiſion brought in by the Councell of Piſa: which matter depending wholly vpon the will of the French King, he laboured to appeaſe him by many meanes, aſſuring him that the rumor that ranne that he had ſent money to the Swiſſers, was a falſe bruite, and declaring that he deſired nothing more then an vniuerſall peace, and to be the common father to all Chriſtian Princes: That he was very ſory that his diſſention with the Church, depriued him of all meanes to know how naturally he was inclined to his amitie; ſeeing that for the honour of the Sea Apoſtolike, and of owne his perſon, he was conſtrained to proceed with him ſeuerally, vntill by his returning to the obedience of the Church of Rome, it were lawfull for him to receiue him as King Moſt Chriſtian, and to embrace him as the eldeſt ſonne of the Church. The King in regard of his owne affaires, deſired the vnion of his kingdome with the Church, the ſame being alſo inſtantly demanded by all his peoples and all his Court, whereunto alſo he was much incited by the Queene; and he knew alſo that there could be no hope of alliance with the Pope in matters temporall, if firſt there were not agreement for controuerſies ſpirituall. For this cauſe, either truſting indeed, or ſeeming to giue faith to his words, he ſent to him as Embaſſadour to negociate in theſe cauſes, the Biſhop of Marſeilles: at whoſe coming, the Pope by decree of the Councell, reinueſted the Biſhops and Prelates of France, againſt whom his predeceſſor proceeded rigorouſly by way of excommunication, as againſt ſchiſ-

ſchiſmatikes, with power to purge themſelues of their contumacie, during the whole moneth of November: and the ſame morning wherein it was thus determined, there was read in the Councell a writing ſubſcribed by Bernardin Carnagial and Federike de S. Severin, wherein forbearing to name themſelues Cardinals, they approued all the acts of the Councell of Latran, promiſing to cleaue to the ſame, and to obey the Pope: wherein conſequently they confeſſed themſelues to be lawfully depriued of the eſtate of Cardinals; which priuation being done by Pope Iulio, had bene in his life time confirmed by the ſame Councell. It had bene debated afore to haue them reſtored, but it was afterwards deferred for the impediment of the Embaſſadours of Ceſar and the King of Aragon, together with the Cardinals of Sion and Yorke, who alledged, that it was a matter vnworthy the maieſty of the ſea Apoſtolike, and of very ill example, to pardon the authors of ſo great a ſcandal, and ſo pernicious tranſpaſſe, full of ſo manifeſt abhomination; a matter which the laſt Pope had conſtantly maintained againſt them, euen to the laſt moment of his life, and that for no other cauſe then for the publike good. But the Pope inclined to that ſide that was leaſt rigorous, iudging it more eaſie vtterly to quench the name of the Councell of Piſa, with clemencie then with ſeueritie: & withall, he would not prouoke the mind of the French King, who was a diligent interceſſor for them: neither was he carried againſt them by any particular hatred, for as much as the iniury was not done to him; but before his Pontificacie he and his brethren had bene great friends to Federike: for which reaſons, of his owne motion he cauſed to be read before the fathers of the Councel, the writing of their humiliation, and aſſigned a day for their reſtoring, which was done in this maner: Bernardin and Federike entred ſecretly into Rome by night, without either habite or note of Cardinals, and the morning following being to preſent themſelues before the Pope ſitting in full Conſiſtory, accompanied with all the Cardinals, except the Swiſſer and the Engliſh, who refuſed to be preſent: they firſt paſſed apparelled as ſimple Prieſts, with blacke bonnets on their heads through all the publike places of the Pallace of Vatican, where they had lodged: a great multitude of people flocking to ſee them, and euery one affirming that ſo publike an ignominie might ſerue as a cruell torment for the vnmeaſurable pride of Bernardin, and no leſſe arrogance of Federike. When they were admitted into the Conſiſtory, they fell downe on their knees, and with many ſignes of great humilitie demanded pardon of the Pope and the Cardinals, approuing all things that had bene done by Pope Iulio, and namely their priuation, and the election of the new Pope, as canonically done; reprouing the conuenticle of Piſa, as ſchiſmaticall and deteſtable. When this confeſſion was ſolemnly enregiſtred and ſubſigned with their hands, they roſe vp and ſtood on their feete, and after reuerence done, they embraced all the Cardinals, who ſtirred not out of their ſeates; and afterwards being apparelled in the habite of Cardinals, were receiued by the reſidue to ſit in the ſame order wherein they were wont to ſit before their priuation. They recouered onely by this act the dignitie of Cardinals, and not the benefices and other reuenues which they were wont to hold, for that long time before they had bene diſtributed to others, as vacant. In this act the Pope ſatisfied the French King, if not fully, yet at leaſt in part: but he ſatisfied him not in other matters, for that he ſought by all the wayes he could to accord Ceſar and the Venetians; which he thought he might eaſily obtaine, by reaſon of the accidents that happened. For he beleeued that Ceſar prouoked by the occaſions beyond the Mounts, would be content to hearken thereto, the more eaſily to recouer Burgundie for his Nephew: and much more the Venetians, as well for that they ſtood amazed with the ouerthrow of the French, as for that they knew the French King (many dangers hanging ouer his Realme) could not for that yeare thinke any more of the affaires of Italy: and likewiſe they ſaw the Spaniſh army neare them, whereunto were to be vnited the companies that were within Verona: they were drained of money, ill furniſhed of ſouldiers, and namely of footmen: and alone were to beare the whole brunt of the warre, without any hope or ſhew of other ſuccours: and yet the Senate anſwered very conſtantly, that they would not hearken to any accord, vnleſſe Vincenſa and Verona were reſtored to them.

Humilitie of two Cardinals

Ceſar at that time demanded of the Pope two hundred men at armes againſt the Venetians: which demand though it was grieuous to the Pope, for feare leſt the French King ſhould be diſcontented, and for that he held it inconuenient for Ceſar and him to become ſuſpected to the Venetians for a matter of ſo ſmall importance: Ceſar notwithſtanding perſeuering obſtinately in his demand, he ſent him vnder Troilo Sauello, Achilles, Torello, and Mutio Colonno, the numbers he required, for that he would not (by refuſing) ſhew any token of vnwillingneſſe to perſeuer in the confederation contracted with the laſt Pope; and for that he thought himſelfe not reſtrained by any obligation that he had with the Venetians: who, beſides that their armie had behaued themſelues almoſt in hoſtile maner vpō the lands of Parma and Piaiſance at ſuch time as Aluiano lay neare Cremona, had not elected Embaſſadours to proteſt their obedience to him, according to the ancient cuſtome, vntill the French men being ouerthrowne, were returned out of Italy. This deliberation brought no litle amaze to the Venetians, not ſo much for the importance of ſuch a ſuccor, as for feare leſt by this beginning the Pope would paſſe further: and they tooke this likewiſe for a manifeſt ſigne that he would neuer be ſeparate from their enemies. Neuertheleſſe they changed not their firſt counſels, but ſtanding reſolute to make as good head as they could againſt fortune, they ſent commandement to their Admirall that was at Corfu, that aſſembling as many veſſels as he could, he ſhould aſſaile the marine places of Powilla; although a litle after, conſidering of what importance it would be to prouoke ſo much the King of Aragon, they reuoked that counſell, as more couragious then diſcreet, as well for the power of that King, as for that he had alwayes made ſhew that he perſwaded Ceſar to peace. The Viceroy remained at Montagnana, not hauing as yet determined what to doe, for as much as the conceptions of the Lanceknights were great, and the enterpriſes that remained to be attempted either of Padua or of Treuiſa very hard, and the forces farre inferiour to the difficulties: for in the whole army there was not aboue a thouſand men at armes, not many light horſemen, and ten thouſand footmen, as well Spaniards as Lanceknights: and alſo there was expectation of the coming of the Biſhop of Gurci, vpon whoſe will all depended. At this time a Spaniſh magiſtrate being in Bergamo to gather the impoſt of fiue and twentie thouſand duckats, taxed vpon that Citie at ſuch time as it was rendred to the Viceroy, Ranſe de Cere ſent thither from Crema part of his ſouldiers, who entring by night by the helpe of ſome of the towne, tooke the Spaniard with all the money he had leuied, and returned afterward to Crema. There was diſcerned about this time a preparation of new troubles in the ſtate of Genes, conformable to the wils of the Duke of Millan and the Swiſſers, to whom Anthonie and Ierome Adorno had recourſe, declaring to the Duke the offices and kindneſſes which had paſſed betweene their fathers and Lodowik his father: That by the aide of their family he had recouered and many yeares holden in peace the principalitie of Genes, of the which he had bene fraudulently depriued by the Dukes Fregoſes: and that the Adorneis had participated with the aduerſe fortunes of the Sforces, for that at the ſame time that Lodowike loſt the Duchie of Millan, the Adorneys were chaſed out of Genes: and therefore it was conuenient that they ſhould likewiſe communicate in his good fortune, ſeeing the ſame affection & the ſame faith continued: and that they ought not to be charged by imputation, if being not ſo much as heard in any place, but abandoned of all hope, their neceſſitie had driuen them againſt their will, to haue recourſe to that King, by whom they had bene chaſed and expulſed before: That on the other ſide, he was to remember the ancient hatred of the Fregoſes, how many iniuries and practiſes had bene wrought againſt his father by Baptiſta and the Cardinall Fregoſa, who were Dukes of Genes ſucceſſiuely; and to conſider how he might truſt Octauian Fregoſa, who, beſides his ancient hatred, refuſed to haue a ſuperiour in that Citie. To the Swiſſers they propoſed the profite, the ſuretie and the honour they might reape hereby: That if by their meanes they were reſtored to their countrey, they would pay a ſumme of money equall to that which Octauian Fregoſa payed to the Spaniards: That by their vertue the Duchie of Millan had bene preſerued, and to them appertained the protection and defence thereof: and that therefore they ſhould conſider how much it would be contrary to the ſuretie of that ſtate, that Genes a citie of ſo neare neighborhood and ſo great importance, ſhould obey a Duke that depended wholly vpon the King of Aragon: and that it were an action very vnworthy their name and glory, to ſuffer Genes (the fruite of the victory of Nouaro) to fall to the profit of the Spaniards, who, whileſt the Swiſſers went with ſo great valour to expoſe themſelues againſt the thundring ſhot of the French, whileſt that (to expreſſe it better) the Swiſſers ranne vpon death, ſate ſtill at their eaſe, without doing any thing vpon the territory of Trebia, watching as it were the iſſue of the battell, either ſhamefully to flie, or fraudulently to ſteale the rewards of the victory gotten with the bloud of others. Theſe reaſons then inflaming them, the Duke cauſed his companies to march, and the Swiſſers aduanced foure thouſand footmen: but the threats of the Viceroy againſt the Duke, and the authoritie of the Pope, who tooke greatly to heart the af-affaires of Octauian, were the cauſe that they gaue ouer preſently. In this meane while the Viceroy went vp to Battallia, a place about ſeuen miles from Padua, where Caruagial riding vp and downe vndiſcreetly with a ſmall ſtrength of horſemen to view the ſituation of the countrey, was taken by Mercurio Captaine of the Venetian light horſemen. At which time the Biſhop of Gurci ariuing in the army, they drew to conſultation what was to be done: & the Biſhop gaue counſel to beſiege Padua, ſaying, he hoped ſo much in the vertue of the Spaniards and Lanceknights againſt the Italians, that in the end they ſhould ouercome all difficulties: That it was a matter of leſſe labour to take Treuiſa, but the reward of the victory was farre different; for that to win Treuiſa onely, was of litle importance for the ſubſtance of the warre, but by the taking of Padua, the townes of Cæſars obedience ſhould ſtand fully aſſured from the troubles and dangers of the warre, and the Venetians ſhould be depriued of all hope to be euer able to recouer the places they had loſt. The Viceroy and almoſt all the other Captaines were of a contrary opinion: iudging it rather impoſſible then hard, to force Padua, by reaſon of the incredible fortifications, it being throughly ſtored with artilleries and all things neceſſary for defence, & abundantly furniſhed with ſouldiers, many yong men of the Nobilitie of Venice being come thither, as they had done at other times. They alledged that the circuite of Padua was large, in which regard, as alſo for the multitude of the defendants and other difficulties, it required to be enuironed with a ſiege of two armies: which they were ſo farre from, that they were not able to make one ſufficient, the number of their ſouldiers being not great, of whom the Lanceknights, who murmured already for their pay, ſhewed themſelues not very forward: That they were not furniſhed with munitions, and wanted pioners, a prouiſion very neceſſary for an enterpriſe of that difficultie. But in the end the reaſons of the Viceroy and the other Captaines gaue place to the will of the Biſhop of Gurci, according to which the army drawing neare to Padua, incamped at Baſſanella vpon the right ſhore of the channell, within a mile and a halfe of Padua, in which place being much endomaged by certaine double cannons that lay planted vpon a baſtillion of the towne, they paſſed the channell, and lodged a litle further from the towne, from whence ſending certaine bands of footmen to S. Anthonies Church within halfe a mile of Padua, they began to approch with leſſe danger, and to caſt trenches neare to S. Anthonies gate: but the labor was great, and the want of pioners no leſſe, in a countrey abandoned of all inhabitants. Therefore the worke aduanced litle, and not without danger, for that the ſouldiers making many ſudden ſallies as well by day as by night, did great domage to thoſe that laboured. They ſuffered alſo great want of victuals, for that onely a ſmall part of the towne being enuironed by the enemies, the eſtradiots that had libertie to iſſue out of the other quarters of the towne, ouerrunning freely the whole countrey, gaue impediment to all that was brought to the campe; certaine armed barks which the Venetians had ſet for that purpoſe vpon the riuer of Adice doing the like, for that the men that they carried, ceaſſed not to make incurſions in all the plaine countrey, now in one part, and then in another. In regard of theſe difficulties, the eſtate of things being eftſoones brought into conſultation by the Viceroy, all men were of opinion, that it would be a leſſe infamy to correct the deliberation vndiſcreetly made, in leuying the campe, then by perſiſting in their error, to be the cauſe of ſome great domage that might happen, which would be accompanied with great ſhame. Which opinion being related to the Biſhop of Gurci by the Viceroy in the preſence of many Captaines, for that he had refuſed to be preſent at the Councell, he made anſwer, That the diſcipline of warre being not his profeſſion, it was no ſhame for him to confeſſe his ignorance in the affaires of warre: and that touching the counſell he had giuen to beſiege Padua, he had not ſo much followed his owne iudgement in that deliberation, as the authoritie of the Viceroy, who both by letters and expreſſe meſſengers had perſwaded the Emperour thereunto, and giuen him great hope to be able to carry it. At laſt the difficulties not ceaſſing, neither for their complaints nor for their debating, but rather the deſpaire to be able to take Padua dayly increaſing, the campe brake vp, after it had lien eighteen dayes afore the wals of Padua: and hauing both at their breaking vp, and vpon the way, the light horſemen at their backs, they withdrew themſelues to Vincenſa, which then was voide of inhabitants, and lay as a prey to who was maiſter of the field. In this meane while the ſouldiers of the Duke of Millan, to whoſe aide the Viceroy had ſent Anthonie de Leua with a thouſand footmen, tooke Pontuiquo, wherein were two hundred footmen in garriſon for the Venetians, who, neither amazed with the thunder of the artilleries, nor diſcouraged with the mines that were made, were conſtrained at the end of a moneth to yeeld for want of victuals, after they had valiantly ſuſtained the aſſault. About the ſame time Ranſe de Cere iſſuing out of Crema, ouerthrew Siluio Sauello, marching with his bands and foure hundred Spaniſh footmen to Bergamo, whither the Duke of Millan ſent him: and a litle after a Spaniſh officer being returned to Bergamo to gather money, Ranſe ſent thither three hundred horſemen and fiue hundred footmen, who tooke both the officer and the Rocke whereunto he was fled for ſafetie with the money he had receiued: in which Rocke were very few men of warre, by reaſon whereof threeſcore men at armes, three hundred light horſemen, and ſeuen hundred footmen, with two thouſand paiſants of the mount of Brianſo, went from Millan vnder the leading of Siluio Sauello and Cæſar Fieramoſquo, to recouer Bergamo: who encountring vpon the way fiue hundred light horſmen and three hundred footmen, ſent by Ranſe to Bergamo, were eaſily put to flight; by whoſe example the reſidue that afore had occupied Bergamo abandoned it, leauing onely a garriſon in the Rocke, which ſtandeth out of the Citie vpon the mountaine called Cappello.

The Viceroy and the Biſhop of Gurci ſoiourned certaine dayes at Vincenſa, and ſent part of the Spaniards vnder Proſper Colonno to ſack Baſciano and Maroſtiquo: not that they had offended, but that with the ſubſtances of thoſe wretched people they might nouriſh the army as well as they could, wherein the payes did faile, for that Cæſar was alwayes preſſed with his accuſtomed difficulties, the King of Aragon was not able alone to ſuſtaine ſo great a burden, and the Duchie of Millan being exceſſiuely taxed by the Swiſſers, could not contribute to the reliefe of others. The army abode at Vincenſa, with great diſcommodities, by reaſon of the continuall vexations of the light horſemen, who ouerrunning day and night the whole countrey, ſtopped all traffike and paſſage of victuals, vnleſſe they were guarded with a great ſtrength, and that of neceſſitie muſt be of men at armes, for that they had but a very few light horſemen: and therfore to be out of this torment, the Biſhop of Gurci went to Verona with the Lanceknights, very much diſcontented with the Viceroy, who following him by ſmall iourneys, got into Albero vpon the riuer of Adice, where he remained certaine dayes to giue oportunitie to them of Verona to gather their vintage and their harueſt, the incurſions of the light horſemen not ceaſſing for all that, who tooke from the Almaines euen neare the gates of Verona, the oxen that drew the artilleries. The Viceroy had layed a former plot to beſtow the army in garriſon in the countries of Breſſia and Bergamaſqua, and at the ſame time to moleſt Crema, which was all that the Venetians held on the other ſide the riuer of Mincia: and that deuice being publiſhed, had made the countries thereabouts ſo ſecure, that the territories of Padua were ful of inhabitants and goods, which was the cauſe that the Viceroy, who had no other meanes to feed his army then by preys and pillage, altering his plot, and calling back the Almains, went to Montagnana and to Eſte, and from thence to the village of Bouolento, where after he had driuen away great flockes of cattell, the ſouldiers conſumed with fire many faire houſes that ſtood thereabout. From Bouolento the deſire of pillage carrying them on, and taking courage for that the Venetian footmen were diſtributed to the guard of Padua and Treuiſa, the Viceroy determined to approch Venice, but againſt the opinion of Proſper Colonno, who told him, it was both raſh and dangerous. Therefore after they had paſſed the riuer of Bacquillon, and ſacked Pieue de Sacco, which is a borough very populous, and full of all things, they went to Meſtro, and ſo to Marguera, which ſtandeth vpon the ſalt waters: from whence, to leaue a more honorable memory of this expedition, they diſcharged towards Venice ten peeces of great artillery, whoſe bullets pierced the Monaſtery of S. Secondo; and at the ſame time they pilled and ſpoiled all the countrey, whoſe inhabitants were fled, moſt impiouſly making warres againſt the wals: for, not content with the rich preys of cattell and other wealth, in their crueltie they burned Meſtra, Marguera, and Liſſafuſina, together with all the other townes and villages of the countrey, not ſparing any houſe or pallace which had any beautie or extraordinary apparence. In theſe inſolencies, the impietie of the Popes ſouldiers and the other Italians, was not the leaſt, but ſo much the greater by how much it was more infamous in them then in the forreiners, to vſe crueltie againſt the magnificence and ornaments of their common countrey. But they of Venice diſcerning within their towne the ſmoke by day, and by night the fire through the whole countrey, and hearing within their houſes the noiſe of the artillery of the enemies, which was planted for no other purpoſe then to increaſe their ignominie, were touched in their minds with great indignation and ſorrow, ſuch a change of fortune ſeeming to euery one hard and grieuous, that in ſtead of ſo great glorie and ſo many victories formerly obtained tained in Italy and out of Italy both by ſea and land, their eyes ſhould then behold a ſmall army, in compariſon of their ancient force and power, ſo boldly and contumeliouſly to offer ſuch a brauado to the name of ſo glorious a Commonweale. In regard of which indignities, the deliberations of that Senate being inforced, who till that day ſtood reſolute, what hopes ſoeuer were offered, not to tempt fortune: they now conſented, by the vehement perſwaſions of Bartlemew Aluiano, that reaſſembling all the ſouldiers, and ſtirring vp all the villages as well of the plaines as of the mountaines, they ſhould aſſay to ſtop the returne of the enemies: a matter which Aluiano ſhewed to be very eaſie, for that they being raſhly come ſo farre, that they were now in the middeſt betweene Venice, Treuiſa and Padua, and chiefly being laden with ſo great a prey, they could not retire without great danger, as well for the incommoditie of victuals, as for the impediment of riuers and hard paſſages: and now the Spaniards vnderſtanding of this new ſtirre, marching a good ſpace, were by this time come to Ciuitella, which when they ſaw they could not get, for that a ſuccour of ſouldiers were entred therein, they lodged a litle beneath neare to Brenta, to paſſe to the village of Conticella, where the riuer of Brenta was paſſable by foord: but they durſt not venture to paſſe ouer for feare of Aluiano, who was on the other ſide with his companies ranged in battell, and his artillery planted along the ſhore of the riuer, carefully looking not onely to that place, but alſo to many others: whereby, if reſiſtance had not bin made, the enemy might eaſily haue paſſed. Now it happened, that the Viceroy continuing his demonſtrations to paſſe ouer at the place below, to the which Aluiano had turned all his forces, he paſſed the night after without any impediment at the paſſage called the New Croſſe, three miles aboue Ciuitella, and from thence he tooke his way with great diligence to Vincenſa; but Aluiano ſeeking to ſtop his paſſage ouer the riuer of Bacquillon, preuented him. Iohn Paul Baillon and Andrew Gritti with a ſtrength of two hundred men at armes, and two thouſand footmen of the forces of Treuiſa, came and ioyned with Aluiano neare Vincenſa: and the opinion of the Venetian Captaines was not to fight with the enemies with banners diſplayed in open place, but guarding well the paſſages of ſtrength and places moſt conuenient, they ſhould labour to ſtop their way on what place ſoeuer they came, drawing now towards Vincenſa. To this end they had ſent Iohn Paul Manfron to Monteſquo with foure thouſand trained men: and to Barberano to hinder their paſſage in the mountains, were ſent fiue hundred light horſmē, with many other bands of the paiſants; & had alſo cauſed the country people to ſeize vpō all the paſſages ỹ led into Germanie, & to fortifie them with ditches, trenches, great ſtones, & trees laid thwart the wayes. Aluiano left Theodor Triuulce to guard Vincenſa with a garriſon ſufficient, and himſelfe with the reſidue of the armie incamped at Olmo, a place within two miles of Vincenſa, vpon the way that leades to Verona: which paſſage with another faſt by, was ſo choked with trenches, ditches, and artilleries planted vpon the places coming to it, that it was almoſt impoſſible to paſſe. The way towards Verona being thus peſtered, it was likewiſe hard for the Spaniards that marched along the mountaines to paſſe through the countries that were mooriſh and full of waters; and alſo difficult to take the way of the mountaine, which was narrow, and guarded by many armed men: in ſo much as being enuironed almoſt on all parts with enemies, both before, behind, and in flanke, and continually followed by great troupes of light horſemen, they could make no deliberation, which was not both difficult and very dangerous. After they had ſpent certaine time in skirmiſhing, they incamped in the beginning of the night, within halfe a mile of the place where the Venetians lay, and there the Captaines conſulting by night among themſelues what was beſt to be done amid ſo many difficulties and perils, they choſe as leaſt dangerous to turne their enſignes towards Germany, to the end to returne to Verona by the way of Trent, although for the longneſſe of the way, and the ſmall garriſon they had left there, they had almoſt an aſſured opinion that the celeritie of the Venetians would preuent their purpoſe. In this ſort then did they march at the dawning of the day towards Baſſan, turning their backes to the enemies, a matter then the which there is nothing more dreadfull or pernicious to an armie; and albeit they marched in order, yet it was with ſo ſmall hope of ſafetie, that they thought the loſſe of all their baggage and horſes of cariage, would be the leaſt harme that could happen to them. Aluiano was not ſo ſpeedily aware of their diſcamping without ſound of trumpet or drum, for that a thicke miſt falling that morning, tooke away the benefite of his ſight: but as ſoone as he perceiued it, he followed them with all the armie, wherein was thought to be a thouſand men at armes, a thouſand eſtradiots, and ſixe thouſand footmen, the eſtradiots vexing were entred two dayes before. Afterwards he distributed his armie betweene Padua and Treuisa: and the Viceroy and Prosper Colonno, after they had sent their men to lie in garrison at Polesina de Rouigna, went to Insprucb to consult with Cæsar of matters incident.

This same yeare the countrey of Friul remained in tranquillitie more then was wont, by the taking of Captaine Frangipan, who was the man that afflicted it more then any other: and therfore the Venetians knowing how much it imported them to retaine him, had refused to render him in exchange for John Paul Baillon; who, for that solicitation had bin made before to exchange him for Caruaial, had got leaue of the Spaniards to go to Rome, giuing his faith to returne prisoner, if the permutation could not be agreed vpon: but for that during the treatie, it happened that Caruaial died, John Paul affirmed, that by the benefite of the accident he was set at libertie, and so holding himselfe acquitted, he would no more returne to him whose prisoner he was. Also at the same time, which was towards the latter end of the yeare, the Adorneys and Fiesquoys who were secretly fauoured, as was supposed, by the Duke of Millan, being entred by night into Genes, and come by intelligence as farre as the Pallace greene, were chased out again by Octauian Fregoso, who meeting them beyond the barriers, accompanied with the footmen of his guard, fought valiantly in his owne person aboue all others, and put them to flight, being no otherwise hurt then a litle in the hand, and Sinibauld de Fiesquo, Hierome Adorno, and Iohn Camilla of Naples, remained his prisoners. Besides that which hath bene said before, it seemes to me a matter worthy of memory, to report that this yeare there were Elephants seene at Rome, a beast which haply had not bene seene in Italy since the triumphs and publike playes of the Romanes: for Emmanuel king of Portugal sending to the Pope a very honorable Embassage to declare his obedience, presented him with many faire presents, and among the rest, with two Elephants which his ships had brought by sea from India, whose entry into Rome was celebrated with a very great concourse of people.

But at the same time the French king, who had other matter in his mind then pompes and publike shews, gaue order to make prouision for the war: and desiring to be assured of the Popes will (fully resolued notwithstanding to follow his determined enterprise whatsoeuer happened) he prayed him to declare himselfe in his fauour, and confirmed the offers he had made vnto him afore, assuring him, that if he were disappointed of his amitie, he would accept of Cæsar and the King Catholike the conditions which he had already refused. He set before his eyes the power of his kingdome, the confederation with the Venetians, and the succours promised by them: how, at that time the forces of Cæsar and the King Catholike were small in Italy, and how both the one and the other of them were very needie of money, hauing no meanes to pay their owne souldiers, much lesse to stirre the Swissers, who would not descend from their mountaines without pay: That all the people of Millan since they had proued the hard yoke of others, desired nothing more then to returne vnder the iurisdiction of the French: and that the victorie ought not to giue cause to the Pope to band against him, for that the greatnesse of the Kings of France in Italy, and his owne in particular, had bene in all seasons profitable to the Sea of Rome; and because standing alwayes contented with the things that of right appertained to them, they neuer had any thought to seize vpon Italy; a matter well testified by so many experiences: That the intention of Cæsar and the King Catholike was farre other, who studied nothing more, then to seize vpon the Empire of all Italy; and either by armes, alliances or policies, to bring into seruitude the Sea and Popes of Rome, no lesse then the other States; a desire which all the world knows to be very ancient in Cæsar: That he should therfore at one time prouide for the surety of the Church, for the common libertie of Italy, and for the greatnesse of the family of Medicis, and make vse of the occasion, which would neuer be presented at any other time, or with other alliance then his. On the contrary, on the behalfe of Cæsar and the King Catholike, there wanted no perswasions full of efficacie, to vrge him to ioyne with them for the defence of Italy: wherein they admonished him, that if conioyned all together, they had bene able to chase the French King out of the Duchie of Millan, they were much more able to defend it against him: and also that he was to remember the wrong he had done to the King the yeare past, sending money to the army of the Swissers at such time as the French armie marched into Italy; and to consider, that if the French king obtained the victorie, he would not be vnmindfull at one and the same time to reuenge himselfe of all the wrongs he had receiued, and to assure himselfe of all dangers and suspitions to come. But the Pope was much more moued by the authoritie and offers of the Swiſſers, who, continuing in their firſt obſtinacies, offered to command and defend with fixe thouſand footmen the paſſages of the mount Senis, of the mount Geneura, and Finalo, receiuing ſix thouſand florins of Rhein by the moneth: and in caſe their payes might be aduanced to fortie thouſand florins by the moneth, they offered to inuade Burgundie with twentie thouſand footmen. The Pope being doubtfull in himſelfe by reaſon of ſuch diuers propoſitions (his feare withdrawing him from the thing whereunto his deſire incited him,) deferred as much as he could, to declare his intention, giuing to euery one generall words and anſwers. But ſeeing himſelfe now almoſt importuned by the Frenth king, at laſt he made this anſwer, that no man knew better then himſelfe, how much he was inclined to his affaires, being not ignorant with what affection he had perſwaded him to paſſe into Italy, in a time when he might haue obtained the victory without danger or great effuſion of bloud: That his perſwaſions, for that things were not kept ſecret, as he had oftentimes required him, were come to the knowledge of others, to the detriment of them both, in as much as for his part, he ſaw himſelf in danger to be aſſailed by others; and the difficulties were become greater for the enterpriſe of the King, ſince others had giuen ſuch order to their affaires, that he could not now ouercome without manifeſt perill, and without the effuſion of much bloud: And that the power of the Prince of the Turkes being newly increaſed by ſo great a ſucceſſe, it was neither conformable to his nature, nor conuenient for the office of a Pope, either to fauour or counſell Chriſtian Princes to make warre amongſt themſelues: And that he could do no otherwiſe then exhort him to ſurceaſſe, expecting ſome other facilitie and better occaſion, which when it happened, he ſhould find in him the ſame diſpoſition to his glorie and greatneſſe, which he had ſo well diſcerned certaine moneths paſt. Which anſwer, (albeit it did no otherwiſe expreſſe his conception) if it had come to the knowledge of the King, had not onely depriued him of all hope of the Popes fauour, but alſo had certified him that the Pope was banded againſt him, both with counſell and with armes. Theſe were the accidents of the yeare 1514.

But death, whoſe cuſtome is oftentimes to cut off the vaine counſels of men euen in their greateſt hopes, was the cauſe that the warre which was ſo forward in apparence, began not with that ſpeed that was expected: for, as the French king was too hote in taking his pleaſure in the excellent beautie of his new wife, who was but eighteen yeares of age, not conſidering his owne yeares, and the weakneſſe of his complexion, he was taken with a feauer, with the which a ſudden fluxe coming vpon him, he died ſuddenly, and made the firſt day of the yeare 1515, memorable by his death. He was a iuſt King, and much beloued of his people, but neither afore he was King, nor after he had the Crowne, did euer find conſtancie either in good or ill fortune: ſeeing that from a ſmall Duke of Orleance as he was, being happily come to the Crowne by the death of King Charles yonger then he, and of two of his ſonnes, he conquered with very great facilitie the Duchie of Millan and the kingdome of Naples, all Italy being gouerned for many yeares almoſt according to his will. He recouered with great proſperitie the ſtate of Genes that was in rebellion, and vanquiſhed with no leſſe glorie the armies of the Venetians, being in perſon at both thoſe victories. But on the other ſide, when he was yet but yong, he was conſtrained by Lewis the eleuenth to marry his daughter that was both both barren and deformed, and yet could neuer get the good will nor countenance of his father in law: after whoſe death, by reaſon of the greatneſſe of the Ladie of Bourbon, he could not obtaine the gouernment of the new King being then in minoritie, and was in a maner compelled to retire himſelfe into Brittaine: and afterwards being taken in the battell of S. Albin, he remained two yeares in priſon. To theſe afflictions may be added the ſiege and famine of Nouaro, the many diſcomfites in the Realme of Naples, the loſſe of the eſtate of Millan, Genes, and all the townes which he had taken from the Venetians: and likewiſe the warre he had in France againſt very mightie enemies, at what time he ſaw his Realme brought into very great dangers. Neuertheleſſe at the time of his death, it ſeemed that good fortune returned vnto him, for that he had defended his kingdome, and had eſtabliſhed peace and alliance with the King of England, with whom he was in good amitie, which gaue him great hope to be able to recouer the Duchie of Millan.

1515. The death of king Lewis the twelfth.

After Lewis the twelfth, ſucceeded Francis d'Angouleſme, who was the next heire male of the bloud royall, and of the ſame line of the Dukes of Orleans. He was preferred to the ſucceſſion of the kingdome before the daughters of the dead King, according to the order of the law Salike, a law very ancient in the Realme of France, which excludeth from the royall dignitie all women, ſo long as there is any iſſue male of the ſame line. The world had ſuch an opinion of his vertues, of his magnanimitie, and of his vnderſtanding and generous ſpirit, that of very long time there had not any come to the Crowne of whom there was greater hope then of this Prince: whereunto was much helping the conſideration of his age, being then but two and twentie yeares old, his excellent beautie, his great liberalitie, the great humanitie he vſed towards all men, together with the ripe knowledge he had in many things: but aboue all he was much pleaſing to the Nobilitie, to whom he ſhewed great fauour. He tooke vpon him together with the title of the French king, the name of Duke of Millan, as appertaining to him not onely by the ancient rights of the Dukes of Orleans, but alſo as comprehended in the inueſtiture that was made by Cæſar in the treatie of Cambray: and likewiſe he had the ſame deſire to recouer it as had his predeceſſor: whereunto not onely he, but alſo all the noble yong Gentlemen of France were induced by the glorie of Gaſton de Foix, and by the memorie of ſo many victories which the Kings reigning next afore had obtained in Italy: although (not to warne others afore the time to prepare to reſiſt him) he diſſembled the matter, as he was aduiſed by his Councel, and in the meane while (as is vſuall in the beginning of Kings reignes) he fell to practiſe the amities of other Princes: from whom were ſent to congratulate him many Embaſſadours, whom he receiued with countenance affable and gracious, but ſpecially the Embaſſadours of the King of England, who deſired to continue with him the amitie begun with King Lewis, (the iniuries he had receiued from the King Catholike being yet freſh in memorie.) There came alſo at the ſame time an Embaſſage from the Archduke, whereof the Lord of Naſſau was chiefe: and in this Embaſſage, for the regard of the Earledome of Flanders, whereof the Kings of France are ſoueraignes, were diſcerned demonſtrations of great ſubmiſſion, in acknowledging of ſuperioritie. Both the one and the other of theſe Embaſſages had a readie and happie expedition: for touching the King of England, the confederation made betweene him and the late King, was confirmed vnder the ſame conditions, ſo long as either of them ſhould liue, reſeruing a reſpite of three yeares for the Scottiſh king to enter into it: and touching the Archduke, ſundry differences ceaſſed, which many men ſuppoſed would haue hindered the peace. But the Archduke, who being no longer in minoritie had newly taken vpon him the gouernment of his eſtates, was moued hereunto for many cauſes, to wit, by the inſtance of the peoples of Flanders, who would in no wiſe haue warre with the Realme of France; by a deſire he had to be aſſured of ſuch impediments as might be oppoſed againſt him by the French in the ſucceſſion of the Realme of Spaine, when the death of his grandfather ſhould happen: and for that he thought it dangerous to dwell without any league of amitie in the midſt betweene the Kings of England and France being conioyned together. And on the other ſide, the King deſired greatly to remoue all occaſions that might conſtraine him to be gouerned by the authoritie and counſell of his grandfather, either by the fathers or mothers ſide. So that at laſt there was made between them in the towne of Paris, a perpetuall peace and confederation, reſeruing facultie for Cæſar and the King Catholike (without whoſe authorities the Archduke contracted) to enter within three moneths. In this capitulation was promiſed the accompliſhment of the mariage betweene the Archduke and the Ladie Renee daughter to King Lewis, which had bene ſo often ſolicited: and that the King ſhould giue in mariage with the Lady Renee ſixe hundred thouſand crownes, and the Duchie of Berry to her and her children for euer; who being then very yong, ſhould haue it aſſigned to her as ſoone as ſhe ſhould come to the age of nine yeares, with this condition notwithſtanding, that ſhe ſhould renounce all rights of inheritance either by the father or mother, and namely ſuch as might appertaine to her in the Duchies of Millan and of Brittaine: That the King ſhould be bound to aide the Archduke with men and ſhips to go to the kingdom of Spaine, after the death of the King Catholike. At the requeſt of the King, the Duke of Gueldres was named; and ſome affirme, that beſides the matters afore rehearſed, it was agreed that in both their names ioyntly, Embaſſadours ſhould be ſent within three moneths to the King of Aragon, to require him to proclaime the Archduke Prince of the Realmes of Spaine (ſuch is the title of him to whom the ſucceſſion appertaineth,) and to cauſe the people to be bound to him by oath: that he would render the kingdome of Nauarre, and abſtaine from the defence of the Duchie of Millan. And it is not to be doubted, that each of theſe two Princes making this confederation, had more reſpect to the preſent commoditie that appeared, then to the obſeruation of the ſame in time to come. For what foundation could be layed vpon the mariage that was promiſed, the Ladie Renee being as yet ſcarcely foure yeares of age?

Francis the firſt comes to the Crowne.

The Fr. king aſſumeth the title of Duke of Millan.

Ratification of peace betweene the kings of England and France.

And

And how could it pleaſe the French king that Madame Renee ſhould be the wife of the Archduke, who (her eldeſt ſiſter being the Kings wife) had her action prepared for the Duchie of Brittaine? for that the Britons deſiring once to haue a particular Duke, at ſuch time as Anne their Ducheſſe maried the ſecond time, agreed that the Dukedome ſhould appertaine to the yongeſt of the children and deſcendents of her, if the eldeſt were preferred to the Crowne of France. The French king in like ſort treated with the King Catholike to prolong the truce made with his predeceſſor, but to leaue out the condition not to moleſt the Duchie of Millan during the truce; and he hoped he ſhould afterwards eaſily compound with Ceſar: for which reaſon he kept the Venetians in ſuſpence, who offered to renew the league made with his predeceſſor; becauſe he would be at libertie to accord with Cæſar againſt them. But the King Catholike, notwithſtanding he ſtood ſtill poſſeſſed of his deſire not to haue warre in the frontiers of Spaine, conſidering how great ſuſpition the prolongation of the truce would giue to the Swiſſers, and that the ſame would be the cauſe (his words being not credited, and his counſels deſpiſed) that the Pope, who till that time had bene in doubt, might turne to the French amitie, refuſed at laſt to prolong the truce, vnleſſe with the ſame conditions wherewith it had bene renewed with the late King: ſo that the King excluded from that hope, and not expecting any more to be able to contract with Cæſar againſt the will and counſels of that King, confirmed the league with the Senate of Venice, in the ſame forme it had bene made with his predeceſſor. Now there remained the Pope and the Swiſſers. Touching the Swiſſers, he required that they would admit his Embaſſadours; but they vſing the ſame rudeneſſe they had done before, refuſed to giue them ſafe conduct. And for the Pope, vpon whoſe will depended wholly the Florentines, he required no other thing of him, then that he would keep himſelf out of all bond, to the end that when the traine of affaires ſhould induce him to reſolue, it might be in his power to make choiſe of the better part; perſwading him that he ſhould neuer find, either for himſelfe or for the aduancement of his houſe, in any other, a greater amitie, a more aſſured faith, nor with better and more honorable conditions.

After the King had layed theſe foundations for his affaires, he began with great care to gather together great prouiſion of money, and to increaſe the bands of his men at armes to the number of foure thouſand, publiſhing that he did theſe things not with intention to make any warre for that yeare, but onely to make head againſt the Swiſſers, who threatned him to inuade Burgundie or Dauphiney, in caſe he refuſed to accompliſh the couenants made at Dyon in the name of the late King. Many beleeued this ſemblance, the rather for the example of former Kings, who had alwayes forborne to intangle the firſt yeare of their reigne with new warres: but that coniecture made no ſuch impreſſion in the minds of Cæſar and the King of Aragon, to whom the Kings youth was ſuſpected, and the facilitie he had (more then other Kings) to command the forces of the kingdome of France, where he was ſo much loued and eſteemed of all men; and beſides, they were not ignorant of the great preparations that King Lewis had left, by reaſon whereof (ſeeing he was aſſured of the King of England) he ſeemed not to determine to make a new warre, but rather that he recontinued the deliberation that was layed by his predeceſſor. Therefore becauſe they would not be taken vnprouided, they fell to ſolicite a confederation with the Pope and the Swiſſers: but the Pope vſing towards both the parties very gracious words, and ſtudying to entertaine them all with diuers hopes, deferred ſtill to make any certaine declaration. And touching the Swiſſers, their former heate did not onely continue ſtill, but alſo was more kindled: the cauſes that had taken their beginning of publike griefes; for the deniall of the augmentation of their penſions; for that King Lewis had entertained the Lanceknights into his pay; for the diſdainfull and iniurious words deliuered againſt their nation; being increaſed by the ſorrowes, diſpleaſures, and priuate ambition, riſing of enuie which the Commons bare to many particulars, who receiued gifts and penſions of the King, and for that thoſe that moſt hotly oppoſed themſelues againſt ſuch as followed the French amities, (which at that time were cõmonly called Gallizzanti,) being by that meanes aduanced, with the fauour of the Commons, into reputation and greatneſſe, feared a diminution of their authoritie, if the Commonweale were againe reallied with the French: in ſo much as matters being diſputed and conſulted vpon not with publik zeale, but with ambition & ciuil diſſention, and theſe men being in more credit then the Gallizzanti, they obtained that the great or rather vnmeaſurable offers of the French king ſhould be refuſed. In this diſpoſition of minds and affaires, the

Embaſſadours of Ceſar, of the King of Aragon, and the Duke of Millan, being aſſembled with the Swiſſers, contracted with them in the name of their Princes, a confederation for the defence of Italy, reſeruing a reſpite of fiftie dayes for the Pope to enter: in which capitulation it was agreed, that to compell the French king to diſclaime all right to the Duchie of Millan, the Swiſſers, receiuing monethly of the other Confederates thirtie thouſand duckats, ſhould inuade either Burgundie or Dauphiney: and the King Catholike with a mightie armie ſhould make warre vpon the Realme of France, either vpon the coaſt of Parpignan or of Fontaraby, to the end that the French king being compelled to defend his owne Realme, (although haply he ſhould determine otherwiſe) might not moleſt the Duchie of Millan. The deliberation of the King was kept ſecret vntill the moneth of Iune, but at laſt, by reaſon of the greatneſſe and ſolicitude of the ſeueral preparations, it was no longer poſſible to diſſemble ſo great & apparent ſtirres: for the prouiſion of money was vnmeaſurable; he leuied many bands of Lanceknights; he cauſed to be drawne towards Lions great ſtore of artilleries; and had a litle before ſent into Guyen to leuie ten thouſand footmen in the confines of Nauarre, vnder Peter of Nauarre, who was newly entred into his pay, for that the King of Aragon being diſcontented with him, by reaſon the ill ſucceſſe of the battell of Rauenna was much attributed to him, would not pay his ranſome which was twentie thouſand duckats, which the late King had giuen to the Marquis of Rottelin to recompence in ſome part the hundred thouſand crownes which he had payed in England; the new King determining to make vſe of him, defrayed his ranſome at his firſt coming to the Crowne, and afterwards tooke him into his pay, when the ſaid Peter of Nauarre for the ſauing of his honour, had ſent to the King of Aragon to excuſe himſelfe, for that being abandoned of him, he gaue place to neceſſitie, renouncing the eſtates which he had giuen him in the kingdome of Naples. It being then manifeſt to all the world, that thoſe preparations tended to make warre vpon the Duchie of Millan, and that the King determined to go thither in perſon; the King began openly to require the Pope to ioyne with him, vſing to this end (beſides many other inſtruments and perſwaſions) the helpe of Iulian his brother, who had newly taken for wife Philibert ſiſter to Charles Duke of Sauoy, and Aunt to the King by the mothers ſide, aſſigning him for dowrie an hundred thouſand crownes of the money which the Pope gaue him: which put him in ſome hope that the Pope in reſpect of the ſtraight alliance he had with him, would readily incline to his amitie; and the rather for that he hauing before treated with the King Catholike to marry Iulian with one of his kindred which was of the houſe of Cardona, it ſeemed that he had preferred that alliance before the other, more in regard of him thē for any other reaſon. And likewiſe he doubted not but Iulian would willingly helpe forward, by a deſire to get by that meanes ſome eſtate, by the which he might furniſh the expences conuenient for ſo great a mariage, and the better to eſtabliſh the perpetuall gouernment which the Pope had newly giuen him of the Cities of Modena, Reggia, Parma and Plaiſance: which being not ſupported by the fauour of mightie Princes, there was litle hope that he could keepe them after the death of his brother. But the King began quickly to giue ouer his hope, for that the Pope had transferred to the King of Aragon for two yeares the moneys of the Realme of Spaine appointed for the holy warres, which as was thought would amount to aboue a million of duckats: and for that he heard with great willingneſſe Albert Carpy and Ierome Vich Embaſſadours of Cæſar and the King Catholike, who were almoſt alwayes about him, and to whom it ſeemed the Pope did communicate all his counſels. Neuertheleſſe the Pope held the King in ſuſpence, giuing faire words, and making ſhew of a good intention to thoſe that negociated for the King, but without any reſolution: as one that deſired aboue all other things that the Duchie of Millan ſhould not be poſſeſſed by forreine Princes. Therefore the King purpoſing to be better aſſured of his intention, addreſſed to him new Embaſſadours, amongſt whom was William Buda of Paris, a man in humane learning, as well Greeke as Latine, of moſt abſolute and onely erudition of all the learned men of our time: and afterwards he ſent to him in the ſame Legation Anthonie Maria Paluoiſin, a man very acceptable to the Pope. But all this was loſt labour, for that before his coming, euen from the moneth of Iuly, he had very ſecretly contracted with others for the defence of the eſtate of Millan: notwithſtanding ſeeking to keepe cloſe that reſolution vntill the neceſſitie of affaires conſtrained him to declare himſelfe, and deſiring withall to publiſh it with ſome excuſe, ſometimes he required the King to conſent that the Church might retaine Parma and Plaiſance, and ſometimes he preferred other demands, to the end that any one of the things which which he demanded being refuſed, it might ſeeme that neceſſitie more then will, had incited him to ioyne with the Kings enemies: and at that time, diſtruſting that he ſhould not be denied ſome one of thoſe things, which all together he would not propound without ſome honeſt colour, he made diuers doubtfull anſwers, and irreſolute. But there were others that vſed towards him likewiſe the ſame ſleights and ſubtilties: for Octauian Fregoſa Duke of Genes, fearing the great preparations of the French king, and on the other ſide holding for ſuſpected the victorie of the Confederates, for the inclination of the Duke of Millan and the Swiſſers to his aduerſaries, had made a ſecret contract with the French king by the meanes of the Duke of Bourbon, and yet very firmely aſſured the contrary to the Pope, both in the time of the debating of it, and after it was reſolued. And becauſe Octauian was one of the ancient friends of the Pope, and of his brother Iulian, and that they had fauoured him at ſuch time as he was created Duke of Genes, the Pope did in ſuch ſort beleeue him, that the Duke of Millan ſuſpecting things for the rumors that went, and hauing determined to inuade him with foure thouſand Swiſſers already come to Nouaro, together with the faction of the Adorneys and the Fieſquois, the Pope was the cauſe that the enterpriſe paſſed no further.

Octauian Fregoſa Duke of Genes compounds with the French king.

This was the capitulation of Octauian Fregoſa: That the towne and iuriſdiction of Genes ſhould be rendred to the King, together with the Caſtle: That Octauian ſhould beare no more the name of Duke, but take vpon him the name of perpetuall Gouernor of Genes for the King, with power to diſpoſe of the offices of Genes: That the King ſhould giue vnto him an hundred men at armes, the Order of Saint Michael, and a yearely penſion during his life: That the King ſhould not reedifie the fortreſſe of Codifa, which was very hatefull to the Genowayes, and ſhould grant to that Citie all thoſe capitulations and priuiledges which had bene reuerſed and burned by King Lewis: That he ſhould giue a certaine proportion of Eccleſiaſticall reuenues to Federike Archbiſhop of Salerne brother to Octauian, and to himſelfe certaine places in Prouence, if euer it hapned that he were driuen out of Genes. When theſe matters were ſpread abroad, it was not hard for Octauian to iuſtifie his reſolution, for that it was diſcerned of all men, that he had great reaſon to feare the Duke of Millan and the Swiſſers: and that which herein was onely found euill, was, that he had ſo many times denied the truth to the Pope, of whom he had receiued ſo many good turnes, and had broken his promiſe, in entring into couenants without his priuitie. And yet in a long letter which he wrote to him afterwards for his iuſtification, wherein he diſcourſed at large the cauſes that had moued him, together with all the excuſes wherewith he might defend his honour with him, and that which he had done; and declared vnto him that it was not done in contempt of the reſpect and deuotion which he owed him, as being Pope, and his benefactor: his concluſion was, that it would be more hard for him to be iuſtified, if he ſhould write to perſons priuate, or to any Prince that meaſured the affaires of eſtate according to priuate regards; but that writing to a Prince as wiſe as any that liued at that time, and who in his wiſedome knew that he could not otherwiſe ſaue his Eſtate, that it was a matter ſuperfluous to offer excuſes to him that ſo well vnderſtood and knew what was lawfull to Princes, or at leaſt what they haue bene wont to do, not onely when they were reduced to ſuch a neceſſitie, but alſo when there was queſtion of the increaſing or making better the condition of their Eſtate.

But now matters were come from words and counſels to deeds and executions. For the King who was come to Lions accompanied with all the Nobilitie of France, and with the Dukes of Lorraine and Gueldres, cauſed his armie to march towards Italy, which was the moſt mightie and flouriſhing hoaſt that had bene ſeene of a long time: and he was aſſured to haue no troubles beyond the Mounts, for that the King of Aragon, who fearing at firſt leſt ſo great preparations might be turned againſt him, had armed his frontiers, and perpetually vnited the Realme of Nauarre to the kingdome of Caſtile, to the end that his peoples might be the more ready to defend it: and as ſoone as he had credible vnderſtanding, that the warre ſhould be made in Italy, he diſmiſſed all the companies he had leuied, holding no more reckoning of his promiſe made the ſame yeare to the Confederates to make warre vpon France, then he had done of all other couenants and contracts made to them the yeares before. At the bruite of the deſcent of the French king, the Viceroy of Naples, who hauing bene many moneths as it were in truce with the Venetians, being come into the countrey of Vincenſa, to draw neare to the enemies that lay incamped in a very ſtrong place neare to Ormes which is not farre from Vincenſa: he remoued his armie to Verona, to go (as he ſaid) to the ſuccours of the Duke of Millan: and the Pope diſpatched into Lombardie his companies of men at armes, with the regiments of the Florentines, vnder the gouernment of his brother, choſen Captaine of the Church, to miniſter aide likewiſe to the ſame State, according to his reſolution not many dayes before with the other Confederates: although continuing ſtill in his accuſtomed faire ſhewes, he gaue out that he ſent them onely for the guard of Plaiſance, Parma and Reggia; and he had proceeded ſo farre with the Embaſſadours of the French king, that the King vndoubtedly perſwading himſelfe that he would fall to accord with him, had diſpatched from Lions to his Embaſſadours, commiſſion and authoritie to conclude, conſenting that the Church ſhould retaine Plaiſance and Parma vntill ſuch time as he ſhould giue ſuch a recompence as the Pope ſhould hold himſelfe contented. But for the cauſes that ſhall be ſhewed hereafter, all theſe remedies were to no end: for it was deſtinated that the defence or loſſe of the Duchie of Millan ſhould be performed onely with the danger and bloud of the Swiſſers, who not ſtaying for any negligence, or ſmall quantitie of money, deſcended continually into the Duchie of Millan, ſo that there was already arriued aboue twentie thouſand, of whom ten thouſand were drawne neare to the mountaines, according to a counſell amongſt them, to keepe againſt the French the ſtraight paſſages of thoſe valleys, which being at the foote of the Alpes that deuide Italy from France, come to open themſelues vpon the plaines of Lombardie. This counſell of the Swiſſers troubled greatly the mind of the King, who afore had promiſed to himſelfe an aſſured victory by reaſon of the greatneſſe of his forces, which was ſuch, that he had in his armie two thouſand and fiue hundred lances, two and twentie thouſand Lanceknights led by the Duke of Gueldres, ten thouſand Baſques (ſo were the footmen of Peter Nauarre called,) eight thouſand French men, and three thouſand labourers that were payed according to the rate of the other footmen. The King conſidered with his Captains, that in regard of the valour of the Swiſſers, it was impoſſible to driue them from thoſe ſtraight and ſtrong paſſages, but with a farre greater number: of whom notwithſtanding ſmall vſe could be made in thoſe ſtraight places, and it would be very hard to do any matter of conſequence in ſhort time, and more difficult to remaine any long ſeaſon with ſo great an armie, in a countrey ſo barren, although there came continually towards the mountaines great ſtore of victuals. Amid theſe difficulties, ſome of the Captaines that were of opinion rather to diuert and draw them away then to ſet vpon them, gaue counſell to ſend out eight hundred lances through Prouence, and Peter Nauarre by ſea with his ten thouſand Baſques which ſhould all ioyne together at Sauona. Others were of opinion that to go ſo farre about were to loſe too much time, that it would weaken the armie, and increaſe too much the reputation of the enemies, for that it would be giuen out that they had not the courage to encounter with them. Then it was reſolued, that retiring not much from the ordinary way, they ſhould ſeeke out ſome other paſſage, that was not guarded by the enemies, or at leaſt not ſo carefully: and that Emard de Prio with foure hundred lances and fiue thouſand footmen ſhould take the way to Genes, not in hope to diuert them, but to make warre vpon Alexandria and the other townes beyond the riuer of Po.

The Swiſſers ſeek to ſtop the paſſage of the Frenchmen.

The French armie.

There be two wayes in the Alpes that leade ordinarily from Lions into Italy; that of Montſenis (this mountaine is in the iuriſdiction of the Duke of Sauoy) which is the ſhorteſt, the ſtraighteſt, and the moſt beaten way: and that of mount Geneura (this mountaine is in the iuriſdiction of Dauphiney) which is the longer way, and leades by turnings to Grenoble. Both the one and the other direct to Suſa, where the plaine beginneth to enlarge: but the French armies are alwayes wont to paſſe by the mount Geneura, notwithſtanding it be ſomewhat the longer way, becauſe it is more eaſie to paſſe, and more conuenient to draw the artilleries. Now the Swiſſers being carefull to keepe theſe two wayes, and the other paſſages thereabouts, were lodged at Suſa, for that the paſſages which be lower drawing towards the ſea, were ſo ſtraight and rough, that it being very hard for the horſes of ſo great an armie to paſſe thereby, it ſeemed the artilleries could by no meanes be carried. On the other ſide, Triuulce, to whom the King had giuen that charge, being followed with a great multitude of pioners, and hauing about him men induſtrious and experienced in drawing of artilleries, whom he ſent to view thoſe places, went ſearching theſe paſſages, if any meanes could be found to paſſe without impediment of the Swiſſers: by which occaſion, the armie that for the moſt part was diſperſed betweene Grenoble and Brianſon, marched ſlowly, expecting what would be determined, whereunto unto they were alſo conſtrained by a neceſſitie to attend the prouiſions of victuals.

About this time a Gentleman ſent by the King of England, came to the French king, who was now departed frō Lions, to exhort him on the behalf of his King, that he ought not to paſſe into Italy for feare to trouble the vniuerſall peace of Chriſtendome. The cauſe of this alteration was, that that King being diſcontent with the alliance made by the French King with the Archduke, fearing leſt his affaires would take too happie a courſe, had ſince begun to lend an yeare to the Embaſſadours of the King Catholike, who ceaſſed not to put into his mind how hurtfull the greatneſſe of the French king would be to him, who, both by a naturall hatred, and for that he had made his firſt actions of warre againſt him, could be no other then a great enemy to him. But that which moſt moued him, was the emulation & enuie of his glorie, which he thought would be much raiſed if he got the victory in the State of Millan: remembring that he, notwithſtanding he found his kingdome in reſt, and very rich for the long peace it had enioyed, together with ſo great a maſſe of treaſure which his father had gathered, that he neuer had not for all ỳ the courage til within certain yeares, to inuade the French king, alone & enuironed with ſo many enemies, and wearied with ſo many aduerſities: That now the French King, ſomewhat yonger then he was at ſuch time as he came to the Crowne, although he found his kingdome ouerwearied and made poore with ſo many warres, durſt yet in the firſt moneths of his reigne, go to an enterpriſe, for the which ſo many Princes were banded againſt him: That touching himſelfe, with all his huge preparations, and ſo many occaſions, he had brought into England no other profite then the Citie of Tournay, and that with expences intollerable and infinite: but that the French king would returne with great glorie into his kingdome, by the conqueſt of ſo faire a Duchie, whereof it was thought he would carry the victory, and would alſo open a way to paſſe further, and haply take the occaſion afore he retired his armie out of Italy to inuade the Realme of Naples. Theſe were the motions that eaſily renewed in his mind the ancient hatred: but becauſe he could not as yet giue impediment to the French king with armes (whereof haply he ſought ſome occaſion or colour) he thought good to ſend him this meſſage: for the which the King not forbearing to march, tooke his way from Lions to Dauphiney, where he met with the armie of the Lanceknights, otherwiſe called the blacke bands, guided by Robert de la Marche, together with all the low Almaines, ſo greatly eſteemed for their valour, and for the loyaltie which they had alwayes ſhewed in the French ſeruices.

The king of England ſends to the French king not to paſſe into Italy

At this time Iohn Iaques Triuulce aduertiſed the King that his artilleries might be carried ouer the Mounts, betweene the maritime Alpes and the Coctien hils deſcending towards the Marquiſdome of Saluſſa: and that although the paſſage was full of maruellous great difficulties, yet by the ſtrength of men and inſtruments it might in the end be accompliſhed: and becauſe there was not on that ſide, nor on the tops of the mountaines, nor in the entrie of the valleys any guard, that it was better to aſſay to ouercome the ruggedneſſe of the mountains and the ſteepnes of the valleys, which was a matter that might be done with paine, but without any danger of men, then to aſſay to winne the paſſages from the Swiſſers, who were ſo much redoubted, being reſolued either to vanquiſh or die, ſeeing withall they could not ſtay there many dayes, if any reſiſtance were made, for that no power or preparation was able to bring through places ſo impaſſable and barren, ſufficient prouiſion of victuals to feed ſo many mouthes. Which counſell being allowed and followed, the artillery that lay in a place conuenient to be turned on all parts, began immediatly to march that way. Triuulce had aduertiſed the King that the difficultie to paſſe the artilleries was very great, but when it was put to action, it was found yet more hard: for firſt they muſt of neceſſitie mount vpon very rough and high mountaines, and that not without extreme difficultie, for that there were no paths or wayes, and ſometimes not ſo much largeneſſe of roomth as was capable of the artilleries, but ſuch as was made by the aide of pioners from hand to hand, of whom there were a great number that marched before, whoſe ſeruice was readie, ſometimes to enlarge the ſtraits, and ſometimes to digge vp the hillocks and lumpes of earth that gaue impediment. From the tops of thoſe mountaines they deſcended by very ſteepe cliffes, whoſe onely aſpect gaue feare to the beholders, into moſt deepe valleys of the riuer of Argentiero. By the difficultie of theſe cliffes oftentimes the artilleries could not be ſuſtained, neither with the horſes that drew them, whoſe number was great, nor with the ſhoulders of the labourers that guided them, and therefore very often they were

driuen to diſmount them, and faſtening them to great cables, they found a way to make them deſcend by the hands of the footmen, who in ſo great difficulties tooke maruellous paines, refuſing no trauell. And yet the labour ceaſſed not when they had ouercome the firſt mountaines and the firſt valleys, for that they found others, which of neceſſitie they muſt paſſe with the ſame difficulties. At the laſt, about the end of fiue dayes, the artillerie was brought ouer the mountaines into the open places of the Marquiſdome of Saluſſa: but with ſo many difficulties, that it is moſt certaine, if they had found any reſiſtance, or if the mountaines had bene couered with ſnowes, as they were wont to be the moſt part of the yeare, they had taken in vaine ſo great trauell. But that which deliuered them from the reſiſtance and impediments of men, was, that no man beleeued that euer they could bring the artilleries by ſuch troubleſome and impaſſable mountaines; and the Swiſſers lodged at Suſa, were carefull to guard the places which muſt be paſſed by ſuch as deſcend the mount Senis, the mount Geneura, or the mountaines adioyning to them: the ſeaſon of the yeare alſo, being then vpon the tenth of Auguſt, had taken from them the impediment of ſnowes which were already melted. At the ſame time paſſed the men at armes and bands of footmen, not without the ſame difficulties, ſome by that way, and ſome by the paſſage called la Dragoniera, and the reſidue by the high tops of the rocke Perotta and of Cunie, paſſages more lower towards Prouence: by the which Monſieur de Paliſſa being paſſed, an occaſion was offered him to do an act worthy of memory. For, departing frõ Singlaro with foure cornets of light horſemen, after he had marched long and with great diligence by the guiding of the countrey men, he arriued before they had ſuſpition of him at Villefranch, a towne ſeuen miles from Saluſſa, and of which there goeth a fame farre greater then the qualitie of the towne requireth, for that the head of that notable riuer of Po riſeth out of a place very neare it. In that towne lay lodged with his companies Proſper Colonno, fearing nothing for the farre diſtance of the enemies, in whom he expected not that diligence & celeritie, which himſelfe being of nature ſlow and heauie, had not wont to vſe; and ſome ſay that he meant to haue departed the ſame day to ioyne himſelfe with the Swiſſers. But howſoeuer it was, it is certaine that he was ſet at the table at dinner, when the ſouldiers of Monſieur de Paliſſa arriued, who were not diſcerned of any till they were neare the houſe: for as much as thoſe of the towne, with whom Monſieur de Paliſſa, thirſting after ſo goodly a prey, had firſt ſecretly conſpired, had with as much ſilence as they could, ſeized vpon the ſcouts & ſentinels. And thus Proſper Colonno, a Captaine of ſo great name, and who as well for his authoritie, as for the credite he had in the Duchie of Millan, was of great importance for this warre, was made priſoner the fifteenth day of Auguſt, farre otherwiſe then appertained to his ancient glorie. Peter Margano a Romane was taken with him, and part of his companie, and the reſidue at the firſt bruit diſperſed themſelues and fled into diuers places.

The paſſage of the French and the taking of Proſper Colonno, changed the counſels of euery one, and the whole eſtate of all affaires, cauſing new diſpoſitions in the minds of the Pope, the Viceroy of Naples, and the Swiſſers. For the Pope, who conſtantly perſwaded himſelfe, that the French king could not paſſe the Mounts for the impediments of the Swiſſers, and truſted much in the vertue of Proſper Colonno, being now quite diſcouraged, commanded his nephew Laurence, Captaine generall of the Florentines, to march but ſlowly, to whom he had giuen in charge to leade the armie into Lombardie, for that Iulian his brother was conſtrained to abide at Florence by reaſon of a long feuer which came vpon him. Who being come to Modena three dayes after the taking of Proſper, tooke occaſion to recouer the Rocke of Rubiera that had bene occupied by Guido Rangon, for the which he payed him at laſt two thouſand duckats, and conſumed many dayes in the countrey of Modena and Reggia. Moreouer, the Pope hauing recourſe to his accuſtomed ſubtilties, diſpatched very ſecretly to the French King, Cintio his familiar friend, to excuſe himſelfe of the things that had bene paſſed till that day, and to begin, by the meanes of the Duke of Sauoy, to ſolicite a compoſition with him, to the end that by that beginning he might haue more facilitie to paſſe further, if the defence of the Duchie of Millan ſucceeded not well. But the Cardinall of Bibiena and certaine others who were caried more by their priuate paſſions then by the intereſts of their Prince, induced him to take a very raſh counſell. For declaring vnto him that there was danger, leſt by the fame of the happie ſucceſſe of the French, and by the perſwaſions and haply by the aide of the King, the Duke of Ferrara would now ſtirre to recouer Modena and Reggia, and the Bentiuolois to returne into Bologna:

lognia: and that amid ſo many other troubles, it would be very hard to contend againſt ſo great a number of enemies: but that it was a farre better and without doubt a more wiſe counſell, to labour to winne them with ſome propertie of benefite, and in all euents to make them his aſſured friends: they aduiſed him to reeſtabliſh the family of the Bentiuoleis in Bolognia, and to reſtore to the Duke of Ferrara, Modena and Reggia: which he had preſently put in execution, if Iulio de Medicis Cardinall and Legate of Bolognia (whom the Pope had ſent thither, to the end that in ſo great troubles he might ſuſtaine things in thoſe parts, and was as it were moderator and counſellor of the youth of Laurence,) had not bene of a contrary opinion: who being touched with diſpleaſure, for the reproch that would haue fallen vpon the Pope by a counſell ſo full of cowardiſe, which no doubt would haue bene greater then had bene the glorie of Iulio in getting to the Church ſo great a iuriſdiction, and being moued with griefe, for that it would make the memory of his legation infamous, for that being ſcarcely entred thereinto, he ſhould reſtore Bolognia, the principall Citie of all the Eccleſiaſtike State, into the power of her ancient tyrants, leauing as a prey ſo great a Nobilitie, which in fauour of the ſea of Rome had openly conſpired againſt them: and therefore hauing diſpatched an expreſſe meſſenger to the Pope, he brought him againe, with reaſons and requeſts, to a counſell more honorable and ſafe. Although Iulio was a baſtard, yet he was made Cardinall by Leo in the firſt moneths of his Pontificacie, following the example of Alexander the ſixt in the effect, but not in the maner. For, Alexander at ſuch time as he created Cæſar Borgia his ſonne Cardinall, cauſed to be proued by witneſſes that depoſed the truth, that his mother at the time that ſhe was conceiued of him, had an husband, inferring thereupon, that according to the meaning of the lawes, the ſonne ought to be iudged to be begotten rather by the husband then by the adulterer: but touching Iulio, the witneſſes preferred the fauour of men afore the truth, for that it was proued that the mother of whom he was begotten, being yet a damzell and not married, afore ſhe conſented to the will of his father Iulian, had obtained of him a ſecret promiſe of marriage.

Theſe new accidents were likewiſe the cauſe that the Viceroy behaued himſelfe farre otherwiſe then he would haue done: who being not yet departed from Verona, for that he could not make his ſouldiers march without money, and becauſe he expected new companies promiſed by Cæſar who was now come to Inſpruch, to the end to leaue ſufficient garriſon within Verona and Breſſia as need required, he began with theſe and other excuſes to temporize and deferre, to ſee what would happen to the Duchie of Millan. Theſe matters alſo moued the Swiſſers, who retired to Pinaruolo immediatly after the paſſage of the French armie: and albeit vnderſtanding afterwards that the King who was paſſed the Mounts, muſtered his people at Thurin, they were gone to Cium, and had taken and ſacked it, for that they refuſed to furniſh them with victuals, and afterwards done the like at Verceil almoſt afore the Kings eyes, who was then at Thurin: yet being at laſt drawne into Nouaro, and thoſe factions of them that were not ſo farre eſtranged from the French amities, taking courage and diſcloſing themſelues the more for their aduerſities, they began to treate of peace with the French king. About this time, thoſe regiments of the French which came by the way of Genes, with whom were ioyned foure thouſand footmen waged by the Genowayes by the working of Octauian Fregoſa, entring firſt into the towne of Caſtellaccio, and then into Alexandria and Tortona, in which townes there was not one ſouldier, became Lords of the whole countrey on this ſide Po: and the King who was come to Verceil, and had there the firſt aduertiſement that the Pope was declared againſt him, which the Duke of Sauoy ſignified vnto him in his name; albeit he chafed extremely, yet (counſell and iudgement being not troubled and hindered by diſdaine) to the end not to prouoke him, he cauſed to be proclaimed publikly, as well through his armie, as amongſt the regiments that had taken Alexandria, that no man ſhould be ſo bold as to moleſt or inuade in any ſort the lands of the Church. Afterwards the King remained many days at Verceil expecting the iſſue of thoſe things that were treated with the Swiſſers, who intermitted not the debating of matters, but on the other ſide ſhewed themſelues full of varietie and confuſion. For at Nouaro, they began to fall into tumult, becauſe the money which the King of Aragon was bound to pay them was not yet come, and tooke by force from the officers of the Pope the money which he had ſent them, and with the ſame fury departed from Nouaro, with intention to returne into their countrey: a matter which many among them deſired, who hauing bene already three moneths

in Italy, and laden with money and bootie, desired to conuey in safetie to their houses the riches they had gotten. But they were scarcely gone out of Nouaro, when the money which was due for the King of Aragons portion, was sent: the which although they had seized vpon as soone as it came, yet when they considered how shamefull such rash deliberations were, and being somewhat returned to themselues, they restored both the one and the other summes, to receiue them according to the accustomed manner at the hands of the officers. Afterwards they went to Galera, expecting another strength of twentie thousand footmen which was said to be newly arriued, and three thousand went with the Cardinall of Sion to be employed for the guard of Pauie. By which occasion, the King (the hope of agreement diminishing by these variations) departed from Verceil to go towards Millan, leauing in Verceil with the Duke of Sauoy, the bastard brother of the Duke, Monsieur de Lautrech, and the General of Millan, to continue the parley begun with the Swissers: and after the departing of the Swissers out of Nouaro, the Citie being brought to his obedience, he left the Castle besieged, which being battered by the artilleries, yeelded within few dayes, reseruing the liues and goods of those that kept it. Afterwards the King, to whom Pauie yeelded, passed the riuer of Thesin, and the same day Iohn Iaques Triuulce ran vp with part of his companies to S. Christophers neare to Millan, & afterwards euen to the suburbes of the gate of Thesin, hoping to be receiued by them of the towne, who being ill contented with the pillages and oppressions of the Swissers and Spaniards, desired to returne vnder the iurisdiction of the French: and also for that the towne was naked of souldiers. But the people of Millan stood in great feare of the Swissers, and the memory was yet fresh of the afflictions they had suffered the yeare before, when for the retrait of the Swissers from Nouaro, they mutined in fauour of the King. Therefore resoluing to expect the issue of things, notwithstanding they wished the victory to fal to the King, they sent to Triuulce to desire him to passe no further, and the next day dispatched Embassadors to the King being yet at Bufaloro, to beseech him, that resting contented with the disposition of the people of Millan, wel affected to his Crowne, and readie to furnish him with victuals, he would not demand of them a more manifest declaration, which would stand him in no stead for the substance of the warre, no more then their declaratiõ the yeare before had helped his predecessor, which brought vpõ them great domages: That he should march on happily, and vanquish his enemies, assuring himself that the towne of Millan should be readie to open their gates to receiue him when he should be maister of the field: whereunto the King, receiuing them with good countenance, albeit at the first he was displeased that they had not receiued Triuulce, answered, that he was content to yeeld vnto their demands.

From Bufaloro the King marched with his armie to Biagrassa, and whilest he remained there, the Duke of Sauoy, (after he had giuen audience to twentie Embassadours of the Swissers that were sent vnto him at Verceil, and going afterwards to Galera accompanied with the Bastard and others deputed by the King,) contracted a peace with the Swissers in the Kings name, vnder these conditions: That there should be betweene the French king and the nation of Swissers a perpetuall peace during the Kings life and ten yeares after his death: That the Swissers and the Grisons should make restitution of those valleis appertaining to the Duchie of Millan which they had occupied: and that they should discharge and acquit that Estate of a bond to pay yearely a pension of fortie thousand duckats: That the King should endue Maximilian Sforce with the Duchie of Nemours, with a yearely pension of twelue thousand frankes, a companie of fiftie Lances, and a wife of the bloud royall: That he should restore to the Swissers the ancient pension of fortie thousand franks, and defray the pay of three moneths to all the bands of Swissers that were then in Lombardie, or on the way to come thither: That he should pay to the Cantons (at certaine termes) the sixe hundred thousand crownes promised in the accord of Dyon, and three hundred thousand for the restitution of the valleys: That he should entertaine continually in his pay foure thousand of them. In this peace were named by common consent, the Pope, so farre forth as he would render Parma and Plaisance; the Emperour, the Duke of Sauoy, and the Marquis of Montferrat, without making any mention of the King Catholike, nor of the Venetians, nor of any other Italian. But this peace was made and broken almost in one and the same day, by the coming of new bands of Swissers, who being insolent and confident for the memory of the victories past, hoped to carry away by that warre no lesse riches, then such as they saw their countrimen loaden withall; and for that cause would in no wise

The treatie betweene the King and the Swissers broken.

heare ſpeake of peace, but to hinder and breake it, they refuſed to reſtore the valleys: in ſo much as the firſt Swiſſers being not able to withdraw them from this eagerneſſe, fiue and thirtie thouſand of them drew to Monſo to lie in the ſuburbes of Millan, Alberto Peter a notable Captaine going from them with many enſignes by the way of Coma, which way the King of purpoſe had left free and open. Thus the peace being almoſt as ſoone broken as made, things returned to the ſame difficulties and doubts, yea farre greater, by reaſon of the new armies and forces that were approched neare the Duchie of Millan. For, the Viceroy leauing for the guard of Verona Marke Anthonie Colonno with an hundred men at armes, ſixe hundred light horſemen, and two thouſand Lanceknights; and twelue hundred Lanceknights in Breſſia, was come at laſt to lodge vpon Po neare to Plaiſance, hauing in his armie ſeuen hundred men at armes, ſixe hundred light horſemen, and ſixe thouſand footmen, with a bridge prepared to paſſe the riuer. And to leaue him no occaſion to complaine, Laurence de Medicis who had with great induſtrie remained many daies at Parma with the armie, wherein there was ſeuen hundred men at armes, eight hundred light horſemen, and foure thouſand footmen, was come to Plaiſance: who had ſent afore foure hundred light horſemen to the Swiſſers whileſt they treated of the accord, to ſerue them to fetch in victuals; which he did at their requeſt, which foure hundred light horſemen were guided by Mucio Colonno and Lodowike Count de Petillano, the one a Captain of the Church, and the other a Commander of the Florentines; whom he ſent not ſo much for any deſire he had to aide the common cauſe, as to giue no occaſion to the Swiſſers not to comprehend the Pope within the peace if they accorded with the French king. On the other ſide, Bartlemew Aluiano, who had ſent word to the King that he would ſo intangle the Spaniſh armie, that they ſhould haue no meanes to hurt him, as ſoone as he vnderſtood the Viceroy was departed from Verona, he went from Poleſina de Rouigna, and paſſed the riuer of Adice; and marching all along Po with nine hundred men at armes, foureteene hundred light horſemen, nine thouſand footmen, and with ſufficient prouiſion of artillerie, he came with great diligence neare the walls of Cremona: of which diligence, vnuſuall among the Captaines of our time, Aluiano himſelfe tooke ſuch glorie, that in his vaunting he was wont to compare it with the celeritie of Claudius Nero, when, to make head againſt Aſdrubal, he led the ſwifteſt part of his armie vpon the riuer of Metauro. Thus the ſtate of the warre was not onely diuers and variable, but alſo confuſed and much intangled. On the one ſide, the French king was neare vnto Millan with an army appointed and furniſhed of all things, who was come to Marignan to giue facilitie to Aluiano to ioyne with him, and to let the vniting of the Eccleſiaſtike and Spaniſh companies with the enemies: and on the other ſide lay fiue and thirtie thouſand Swiſſers, which was a force of footmen full of valour, who till that day could neuer be vanquiſhed by the French. The Viceroy kept along the ſhores of Po neare to Plaiſance, and vpon the way adioyning that leades to Loda, hauing a bridge readie dreſſed to paſſe the riuer, to the end to ioyne with the Swiſſers: and Laurence de Medicis was gotten into Plaiſance with the regiments of the Pope and the Florentines, to ioyne with the Viceroy to the ſame ends: and Aluiano a circumſpect and reſolute Captaine, lay with the Venetian armie vpon the territories of Cremona, almoſt vpon the banke of Po, to aide the French king, either by ioyning with him, or by drawing away the Eccleſiaſtike and Spaniſh regiments. The Citie of Loda which ſtandeth in the mid way betweene Millan and Plaiſance, and of an equall diſtance from them both, ſtood abandoned of each part. It had bene ſacked before by Ranſe de Cere who had entred into it as a ſouldier to the Venetians, and who for quarrels ariſing betweene him and Aluiano, had afore, with proteſtations and almoſt with threats, got leaue of the Senate to depart, and was entred into the Popes pay with two hundred men at armes, and two hundred light horſemen. But for that his ſouldiers could not follow him with that ſpeed, by reaſon the Venetians would not ſuffer many of them to depart from Padua where they lay, he went from Loda, to fill vp his numbers with thoſe companies wherewith he had bene retained. And the Cardinall of Sion, who being amazed with the practiſes which his people held with the French King, and by the wauering eſtate of the Citie of Millan, was fled to Plaiſance with a thouſand Swiſſers and with part of the regiments of the Duke of Millan, and afterwards went to Cremona to ſolicite the Viceroy to march on: and being on the way towards Millan, before that ſide was occupied by the French king, he left certaine of his companies for the guard of Loda, who when they heard that the French king was come to Marignan, abandoned the place for feare. But whileſt the Viceroy lay vpon the riuer of Po, and be-before Laurence de Medicis came to Plaiſance, Cintio whom the Pope had ſent to the French King, was taken by the ſouldiers of the Viceroy, who finding about him Briefes and letters of credite, although he let him ſuddenly paſſe, for the reuerence he bare to him that ſent him, yet he entred into great doubt, that the hope that had bene giuen him, that the Church armie that was ioyned with him would paſſe the riuer of Po, was but vaine: and ſo much the more, for that at the ſame time Laurence de Medicis was detected to haue ſent ſecretly to the French king one of his men; which he did either of his owne motion, or by the commandement of the Pope; to excuſe himſelfe for that he led the armie againſt him, being conſtrained by a neceſſitie to obey the Pope; but that as much as he might, without incenſing his vnkle, or ſtaining his owne honour, he would endeuour himſelfe to content him, and giue him ſatisfaction, as he had alwayes had a deſire to do, and now more then euer. Now when Laurence was come to Plaiſance, there began a diſputation betweene the Viceroy and him, with others that ſate with them in counſell, whether it were beſt to paſſe ouer the riuer of Po all together to ioyne with the Swiſſers, amongſt whom were produced diuers reaſons. Such as perſwaded to paſſe the riuer, ſaid, there was no reaſon to diſſwade them from going into Loda, for that being there, they might let Aluiano for ioyning with the French armie; and for their owne parts, they ſhould haue good oportunitie to vnite themſelues with the Swiſſers, either in going to Millan to meet them, or elſe the Swiſſers coming towards them: and if the French men came to get it (as the bruite went they would) being already vpon the way betweene Loda and Millan, they ſhould haue vpon their backes both their armies ioyned together, which would put them in trouble and danger: and that haply it would not be hard to find meanes to ioyne with the Swiſſers, notwithſtanding they ſhould be driuen to make a greater circuite: That this reſolution was very profitable, yea neceſſary to the enterpriſe, both to take from the Swiſſers all occaſions of new practiſes of accord, and to increaſe their forces with ſuch things as they ſtood in need of againſt ſo great an armie, and chiefly of horſes: That beſides this, the faith and honour as well of the Pope as of the King Catholike did ſo require, both for that the capitulations bound them to ſuccour the Eſtate of Millan, and that they had often promiſed no leſſe to the Swiſſers, who finding themſelues diſappointed of aſſured friends, might take occaſion to become moſt dangerous enemies: That it was neceſſary for the intereſt and regard of their owne Eſtates, for that the Swiſſers either loſing the battell, or making accord with the French king, there would remaine no force in Italy able to let him from ouerrunning the whole eſtate of the Church, euen to Rome it ſelfe. On the contrary were produced many reaſons, whereof this was the chiefe, that it was not credible that the French king had not alreadie ſent a great ſtrength of ſouldiers to Loda; and if it were ſo, they would be driuen to retire with ſhame, and haply not without danger, ſince they ſtood ſubiect to haue at one time the French and the Venetians either in front or in flanke: and that they could not repaſſe the bridge without confuſion & long tract of time: That ſuch a danger were not to be reiected, if the prize & the recõpence were very great. But although they ſhould be entred into Loda being abandoned, what profite could grow by the enterpriſe? how could they lay their plot, either to go and vnite themſelues with the Swiſſers, or the Swiſſers to come and ioyne with them, there being ſo mightie an armie between Millan and Loda? And beſides, haply it was not a counſell aſſured, to put into the hands of men ſo raſh and vnreaſonable, all the forces of the Pope and the King Catholike, ſeeing the greateſt part of them had made peace with the French king, and were at diſcord with their companions. At laſt it was reſolued, that the firſt day both the armies ſhould paſſe ouer Po without any baggage or cariage, leauing ſufficient garriſon within Parma and Plaiſance, for feare of the Venetian armie, whoſe light horſemen euen at that time had made incurſions and pillages through the countrey. But this reſolution was not ſincerely executed by any of the parties, for that each of them thought in making ſhew to be willing to paſſe, to lay the fault vpon another without putting himſelfe in danger. For the Viceroy that was already entred into ſuſpition for the going away of Cintio, and knowing well enough with what cunning the Pope proceeded in his affaires, was of opinion, that his will was that Laurence ſhould paſſe no further: and Laurence conſidering how hardly the Viceroy was drawne to commit his armie to the power of fortune, gaue of another the ſame iudgement that others gaue of him. In the afternoone the Spaniſh bands began to paſſe the bridge, whom the Church armie was appointed to follow with ſpeed: but by reaſon of the night that came vpon them, they deferred by neceſſitie vntill the next morning, and not onely they

paſſed not, but alſo the Viceroy retired with his armie on this ſide the riuer, being aduertiſed by a ſcout of foure hundred light horſemen ſent out from both the armies to eſpie the enemies and their doings, that an hundred French lances were entred into Lodi the day before: ſo that the Viceroy and Laurence returning to their firſt lodgings, Aluiano went with his armie to Lodi.

About this time the French King departed from Marignan to lodge at Saint Donato, and the Swiſſers retired to Millan, one part whereof being vnwilling to heare of warre, and the other of peace, there aroſe oftentimes amongſt them diſputes and tumults. But at laſt, as they were one day aſſembled all together, the Cardinal of Sion began with words ful of affectiō & vehemency, to incite them without any more deferring to iſſue out ỹ ſame day to aſſaile the French king, & ỹ they ſhould not ſtand ſo much vpon the number of horſmen & artilleries of the enemy, as thereby to forget the ancient valour of the Swiſſers, and the victories which they had obtained againſt the French. Hath our nation (ſaid he) ſuſtained ſo many paines, bene expoſed to ſo many dangers, powred out ſo much bloud, to the end to leaue (in one day) ſo great glorie, and ſuch a reputation, to the enemies that haue ſo often bene vanquiſhed by vs? Are not theſe the ſame French men who being ioyned with vs haue obtained ſo many victories, but ſeparate frō vs, haue bene continually vanquiſhed of euery one? Are not theſe the very ſame who the laſt yeare were ouerthrown at Nouaro with ſo great glory by a ſmal cōpany of vs? Be not theſe they, who aſtoniſhed at our valour, & confuſed for their owne cowardize, haue exalted to the heauens the name of the Swiſſers? famous when we were conioyned with them, but more famous being ſeparate from them? Thoſe that were at Nouaro had neither horſes nor artilleries, and yet without expecting the ſuccours that were to come, they ranne with Captaine Motin (the ornament and glorie of the Swiſſers) to charge the French men euen in their tents, and without fearing their artilleries, ouerthrew them, and ſlue together with them ſo many Lanceknights, as they blunted their weapons and wearied their armes: and do you beleeue that now they wil haue the courage to abide fortie thouſand Swiſſers, an armie ſo valiant and ſo puiſſant, that it is able to meete in the field with all the reſidue of the world ioyned together? Be you aſſured, they will flie at the very noiſe of your coming, and that their coming to Millan is not in confidence of their owne valour, but onely through an hope they haue of your diuiſions. The perſon and preſence of their King cannot ſtay them, for as much as being in feare to put his life and Eſtate in danger, he will be the firſt that will looke to his ſafetie, and will ſerue as example to the reſidue to do the like. If with this armie, that is to ſay, with the forces of the whole countrey of Swiſſerland, you haue not the courage to ſet vpon them, with what forces can you haue hope to be able to reſiſt them? To what end are we deſcended into Lombardie? & wherfore come to Millan, if we ſhall be feareful to go charge our enemies? What ſhall become of the braue words and proud threats which we haue vſed all this yeare, when we vaunted that we would deſcend into Burgundie, and reioyced for the accord of the Engliſh King, and the Popes inclination to confederate with the French King, eſteeming our glorie would be ſo much the greater, by how much all thoſe great Princes were ioyned in conſpiracie againſt the State of Millan? It had bene better we had not enioyed the yeares before ſo many honorable victories, nor chaſed the French out of Italy, and to haue contained our ſelues within the termes of our ancient renowne, if now deceiuing the expectation of all men, we ſhall proceed with an vniuerſall cowardiſe. Now is the world to iudge, whether our vertue was the cauſe of our victorie at Nouaro, or our fortune. If we ſhew our ſelues fearfull of our enemies, euery one will aſcribe it either to chance or to temeritie: but if we ſhal vſe the ſame vertue, all men wil confeſſe, that it was our valor, and hauing (as doubtleſſe we ſhall) the ſame ſucceſſe, we ſhall not onely be feared and redoubted by the people of this age, but alſo be admired and recommended by poſterities to come, by the iudgement and praiſes of whom the name of the Swiſſers ſhall be raiſed aboue that great name of the Romanes, for that it is not read of them, that they haue euer vſed ſuch a reſolute hardineſſe, nor gotten any victory with ſo great valour, nor that euer without neceſſitie they ſet vpon their enemies with ſo great diſaduantage: but of vs may be read the battell we gaue neare to Nouaro, where, with a few ſouldiers, without artilleries, and without horſes, we put to flight a mightie armie, furniſhed with all neceſſary prouiſions, and guided by two moſt notable Captaines, the one the moſt renowmed in all France, and the other the chiefe of all Italy. We ſhall leaue behind vs alſo the memory of the encounter at S. Donato, executed on our parts with the ſame difficul« ties, againſt the perſon of a French King, and againſt ſo many Lanceknights, who by how much « they are many in number, by ſo much will they fill, and ſatisfie our hatred, and giue vs ſo « much the better occaſion to extinguiſh for euer the name of their armes, and by ſo much the « more ſhall they for euer abſtaine raſhly to compare themſelues with the Swiſſers in matters of « warre. It is not a matter certaine, but rather ſuch as ſeemes impoſſible, for many difficulties, « that we ſhould be ſuccoured by the Viceroy, or the bands of the Church, to what end then « ſhall we attend them? And beſides, their coming is not neceſſary, yea this impediment ought to « be acceptable to vs, for ẏ the glorie wil be wholy ours, together with the great ſpoiles & wealth « which are in the armie of our enemies. It is very vnlikely that Captain Motin wil cõmunicate his « glorie to ſtrangers, ſeeing he would not do it to his owne countrimen. And ſhall we be ſo « cowardly, and make ſo ſmall account of the fame of our valour, as, though they could ioyne « with vs, to attend them, to the end to communicate ſo great an honour to ſtrangers? The repu- « tation of the Swiſſers cannot endure, neither doth the eſtate of affaires require, that we ſhould « deferre, or ſtand vpon any more counſels. Let vs take the field, and preſently aſſaile « the enemies. It belongs to cowards, to whom dangers are fearfull, to conſult and ſpend « the time in counſell, and not to a nation of ſuch warlike minds as we beare, to whoſe glorie it « appertaines to make triall of the enemie as ſoone as he is diſcloſed. Therefore truſting in God, « who iuſtly purſueth the pride of the Frenchmen, take your pikes in your hands with your accu- « ſtomed courage, ſound vp your drummes, and let vs go, without loſing of time, and without « deferring an houre onely, to aduance our enſignes and ſatisfie our thirſt with the bloud of « thoſe, who by their pride ſeeke to trouble the whole world, but by their cowardiſe are alwayes « left a prey to euery one.

The battell of Marignan.

The Swiſſers encouraged and incited by theſe ſpeeches, ſuddenly armed themſelues with great furie: and as ſoone as they were iſſued out of the gate towards Rome, they fell into battell array; and albeit the day was almoſt ſpent, they marched with their ſquadrons towards the French armie, with ſuch cheerfulneſſe, and ſo great ſhouts, that ſuch as knew not the cauſe, might certainly haue beleeued that they had obtained ſome glorious victorie. The Captaines encouraged the ſouldiers, telling them that at what houre ſoeuer they came neare the campe of the enemies, they would ſuddenly giue the ſigne of battell, aſſuring them that they would couer the field with dead bodies, and vtterly raze out the name of the Lanceknights, and chiefly of thoſe, who prognoſticating their death, bare the blacke Enſignes. Now as in this furie they were come neare the place where the French men lay, albeit there remained no more then two houres of that day, they began the battell with a deſperate courage, charging the artilleries and fortifications of the enemies, breaking and diſperſing at this firſt charge, the bands that made head againſt them, and with their incredible valour won part of their artilleries. But the horſemen with a great part of the armie, and the King himſelfe who was enuironed with a valiant troupe of Gentlemen, coming againſt them, their great furie was ſomewhat abated, and there began a cruell fight betweene them, which, with diuers chances, and great danger of the men at armes of France, who began to ſtagger, continued till foure houres within night, diuers French Captains lying dead on the ground, and the King himſelf, receiuing many wounds with a pike: and then, both the parties being ſo wearied, that they were no more able to hold their weapons in their hands, they ſeparated, and withdrew themſelues frõ the conflict without ſound of trumpet, or commandement of their Captaines, and the Swiſſers incamped in the ſame place, expecting the next Sunne or day light, in the meane ſpace neither partie offending the other, as if there had bene a ſecret truce betweene them. But the firſt aſſault of the Swiſſers (to whom the Cardinall cauſed victuals to be brought from Millan whileſt their bodies tooke reſt) hauing ſucceeded ſo happily, that there ranne a bruite throughout all Italy, that the Swiſſers had put to flight the armie of the enemies, the King conſumed not vnprofitably the reſidue of the night; for, knowing the greatneſſe of the perill, he laboured to range his artilleries into places conuenient, to reaſſemble his horſemen, and put in order his ſquadrons of Lanceknights and Gaſcons. By this time it was day, at the beginning whereof, the Swiſſers, who not onely deſpiſed the French armie, but alſo made no reckning of al the forces of Italy knit together, recontinued their charge vpon the enemies with the ſame furie, and very raſhly: who entertaining them valiantly, but with more diſcretion and better order, the Swiſſers found themſelues beaten partly by the artilleries and partly by the crosbowes of the Gaſcons, and withall charged by the horſemen,

ſo that they were battered both in front and in flanke. Beſides, at the riſing of the Sunne came Aluiano, whom the King had ſent for ouer night, bringing with him his light horſemen and the moſt ſpeedie part of his armie: he arriued at ſuch time as the fight was moſt cloſe and furious, and all things reduced into greateſt trauell and danger: and hauing the reſidue of his armie coming on in due courſe, he ſet furiouſly vpon the backes of the Swiſſers; who, notwithſtanding they alwayes maintained the fight with great valour and reſolution, yet ſeeing the braue reſiſtance that was made, and that the Venetian armie was now arriued, they began to deſpaire of the victory, ſo that the Sunne hauing now ſhined many houres vpon the earth, they ſounded the retrait, and charging vpon their ſhoulders the artilleries they had brought with them, they withdrew their ſquadrons, and retired, keeping alwayes their accuſtomed order, and marched faire & ſoftly towards Millan, with ſo great aſtoniſhment of the French, that of the whole armie neither horſman nor footman had the courage to follow them: onely there were two companies of them, who being fled into a farme hourſe, were burned therein by the Venetian light horſemen. The reſidue of the armie returned to Millan, not breaking their order, retaining ſtill in their apparence and countenance, the ſame conſtancie and aſſurance: and ſome ſay that they buried fifteene peeces of great artilleries which they wonne at the firſt charge, for that they had no oportunitie to carry them away. All men with one common conſent do affirme, that there had not bin ſeene in Italy of long time a battell more furious and dreadful: for that, what by the deſperate valour wherewith the Swiſſers began the charge, and after by the errors of the night the order of the whole armie being confuſed, and the fight ſo mixed, that they could not obſerue any commandement nor perceiue any ſigne, all things were wholly expoſed to fortune. The King himſelfe who was many times in danger, might well diſcerne, that his preſeruation came more by his owne vertue and good fortune, then by the aide of his people, from whom he was oftentimes ſeparate by the confuſion of the battell and by the darkneſſe of the night: ſo that Triuulce (a Captaine who had ſeene ſo many things) affirmed, that this battell was fought by Giants and not by men, and that eighteene battels wherein he had bene preſent, were but combats of litle children, in compariſon of this; and was of opinion, that without the aide of the artilleries the victory had remained to the Swiſſers, who being entred at the firſt charge within the fortifications of the French, and recouering from them the moſt part of the artilleries, had alwayes wonne further into their campe. And likewiſe the arriuing of Aluiano was to great purpoſe for the French, who coming vpon them when the battell was yet doubtfull, he gaue courage to the French, and terrified the Swiſſers, who ſuppoſed that the whole Venetian armie was with him. Touching the number of the dead, if euer it was vncertaine in a battell (as almoſt alwayes it is) it was moſt vncertaine in this, men ſpeaking diuerſly, ſome by paſſion, and ſome by errof. Some affirme more then foureteene thouſand Swiſſers to be ſlaine, others ſay more then ten thouſand; and thoſe that ſpeake more moderatly, eight thouſand; and there wanted not ſuch as would reduce them to three thouſand, all men of litle worth. But on the French part, in the encounter that was giuen ouer night, were ſlaine Francis brother to the Duke of Bourbon, Monſieur d'Imbercourt, the Count of Sancerre, and many other men of worth: in that of the next day, the Prince of Tallemont ſonne to Monſieur Trimoille, Buſſi d'Amboiſe, Chaſtelart of Sauoy, and Mouy Enſigne-bearer to the Kings band; all perſonages of marke, either for their nobilitie and greatneſſe of eſtate, or for the honorable places they managed in the armie: and touching the number of their dead, whereof men ſpake diuerſly for the ſame cauſes, ſome hold that there died ſixe thouſand, others that there was not aboue three thouſand, amongſt whom were certaine Captaines of the Lanceknights.

When the Swiſſers were retired to Millan, they fell into great diſagreement, for that ſome were deſirous to come to accord with the French King, and others that they ſhould continue the defence of Millan: and thoſe Captaines that afore had ſolicited the accord, ſeeking ſome cauſe leſſe diſhoneſt to be gone, demãded mony of Maximilian Sforce, knowing wel inough y he was not able to pay them: and then the bands of footmen at the perſwaſion of Roſt their Colonell, departed the day following to returne into their country by the way of Coma, giuing hope to the Duke that they would returne ſpeedily to ſuccour the Caſtle, wherein remained fifteene hundred Swiſſers and fiue hundred Italians. With this hope, Maximilian Sforce accompanied with Iohn Gonzaga, and Ierome Moron with other Gentlemen of Millan, incloſed himſelfe in the Caſtle, after he had with great difficultie conſented that his brother Francis Duke of Bary ſhould go into Germany: and the Cardinall of Sion tooke his iourney towards Cæſar to ſolicite for ſuccours, hauing giuen his faith to returne ſuddenly. The Citie of Millan thus abandoned, yeelded to the French King, agreeing to pay him a great ſumme of money: but the King would not enter into the towne ſo long as the Caſtle was held by the enemies, holding it a matter vnworthy the maieſtie of a King, to enter into a towne that is not wholly in his power. The King cauſed Maſſes to be ſong ſolemnely for three dayes in the place where he had wonne the battell. The firſt was to thanke God for his victorie; the ſecond to pray vnto him for the ſoules of thoſe that were ſlaughtered in the battell; and the third for peace: and in perpetuall memory of his victory, he built in the ſame place a Chappell. All the townes and Caſtles of the Duchie of Millan followed the fortune of the victory, except the Caſtle of Cremona and that of Millan, to the ſiege whereof Peter of Nauarre being ſent, he aſſured that he would carry it in leſſe then a moneth, not without the maruell of all men, foraſmuch as the Caſtle was very ſtrong, and plentifull of all things neceſſary for to defend and keepe it, and for that there were within it more then two thouſand men of warre. The Viceroy hauing receiued aduertiſement of the victory of the French, remained a few dayes in the place where he was incamped, and that more by neceſſitie then by will, by reaſon that he could not eaſily remoue his armie for want of money. But hauing at laſt receiued a certaine ſumme, and borrowed ſixe thouſand duckats of Laurence de Medicis, he retired himſelfe to Pontenuro, with intention to go to the Realme of Naples. For, albeit the Pope vnderſtanding what was hapned, had from the beginning expreſſed to the world the conſtancie of his predeceſſor, the Embaſſadours of the Confederates perſwading him to make head againſt fortune, and to endeuour to hold the Swiſſers in good diſpoſition, or at leaſt if they would reuolt, to take in their place the Lanceknights: yet he was of opinion, that the remedies and prouiſions would fall out too ſlow for his perils, and that he ſhould be the firſt that ſhould be aſſailed: for that though the reuerence of the Church held the King from moleſting the Eccleſiaſtike State, yet he could not beleeue, that it was able to retaine him from aſſailing Parma and Plaiſance, as members depending on the Duchie of Millan, and from moleſting the State of Florence; a matter wherein all regards did ceaſſe, and for the which he would thinke himſelfe as deeply offended, as if violence were directly offered to the State of the Church. And certainly it was not without cauſe that he was in feare, for that the King had already giuen order to caſt a bridge ouer the riuer of Po neare to Pauie, to ſend to take Parma and Plaiſance, and after the taking of thoſe Cities, if the Pope refuſed his amitie, to ſend by the way of Pontreſmo to chaſe the Medices from the Citie of Florence. But now according to his commiſſion, the Duke of Sauoy and the Biſhop of Tricaro his Nuncio, treated with the King, who fearing leſt he ſhould make new alliances againſt him, and bearing great reuerence to the Sea Apoſtolik, for the terror that was through the whole Realme of France by reaſon of the perſecutions receiued by Iulio, he deſired much to be at vnitie with him. Therefore there was concluded betweene them a preſent confederation for the defence of the States of Italy, wherein was particularly expreſſed, that the King ſhould take vpon him the protection of the perſon of the Pope, the State of the Church, Iulian and Laurence de Medicis, and the State of Florence: That the King ſhould giue an Eſtate in France and a penſion to Iulian, and to Laurence a penſion and a companie of fiftie Lances: That he ſhould conſent that the Pope might giue paſſage to the Viceroy through the ſtates and iuriſdiction of the Church, to returne with his armie to the kingdome of Naples: That the Pope ſhould be bound to cauſe the ſouldiers to depart out of Verona that were there, and withall, to countermand the companies ſent to the ſuccours of Cæſar againſt the Venetians: That he ſhould giue vp to the French King the Cities of Parma and Plaiſance, and in recompence thereof, the King to agree, that from thence forward the Duchie of Millan ſhould be bound to furniſh it ſelfe with the ſalt of Ceruia, a matter of great profite to the Church, and wherein the Pope had already agreed with the Duke of Millan in the confederation he made with him: That a compromiſe ſhould be committed to the Duke of Sauoy, to iudge whether the Florentines had broken the confederation made with King Lewis; and if they had offended that way, then he to haue power to impoſe ſuch penaltie as they had deſerued: which the King ſaid, he demanded more for his honour, then for any other reſpect. As ſoone as this concluſion was made, the Biſhop of Tricaro went to Rome in poſt to perſwade the Pope to ratifie it, and Laurence withdrew to Parma and Regge the companies that were within Plaiſance, to giue occaſion to the Viceroy to depart the ſooner; and himhimſelfe went to the King to obtaine his good fauour, and to perſwade him (according to the artificiall inſtruction of his Vnkle) that in all euents he would depend vpon him. The Pope was hardly induced to this ratification, for that it diſpleaſed him much to loſe Parma and Plaiſance: and he could willingly haue temporized to ſee what the Swiſſers would firſt determine, who hauing called a Diot at Zurich (the principall Canton of all the Swiſſers, and enemie to the French) debated to giue reſcue to the Caſtle of Millan, although they had abandoned the valleys and the townes of Bellinzona and Lugarno, but not the Caſtles, of whom neuertheleſſe the King obtained that of Lugarno, by giuing ſixe thouſand crownes to the Captaine: but the Griſons would not abandon Chiauenna. At laſt the Biſhop of Tricaro laying afore him the danger leſt the King ſhould preſently inuade Parma and Plaiſance, and ſend men of warre into Tuſcane, and aggrauating much the harmes the Swiſſers had receiued at the battell of Marignan, the Pope was content to ratifie the peace, albeit vnder this moderation, that neither he nor his Agents ſhould be bound to giue vp into the Kings hands Parma and Plaiſance, but by leauing them voide of men and officers, to giue libertie to the King to enter vpon them: That the Pope ſhould not be bound to reuoke his people from Verona, for that he would not commit ſuch an iniurie againſt Ceſar: which notwithſtanding he promiſed to do as ſoone as any conuenient occaſion was offered; and that the Florentines ſhould be abſolued of the pretended breaking of the league. The accord bare alſo that the King ſhould not take vpon him the protection of any feodarie or ſubiect of the State of the Church, and that not onely he ſhould not hinder the Pope to proceed againſt them as their ſupreme Lord with correction, but alſo that he ſhould be bound to miniſter aide to him in that action when he ſhould be required. Moreouer it was agreed that the Pope and the French King ſhould haue an enteruiew together in ſome place conuenient; which was a matter propoſed by the King, but deſired indifferently by them both: by the King, the better to eſtabliſh that amitie, to aſſure the eſtates of ſuch friends as he had in Italy, and for that he hoped with his preſence, and by offering great aduancements to the Popes brother and nephew, to obtaine, that with his conſent he might inuade the Realme of Naples, a matter which he deſired moſt ardently: by the Pope, to the end that by this office, and maner of dealing, moſt fit to winne grace and amitie with euery one, to entertaine the King whileſt he ſtood in ſo great proſperitie: although many approued not of this deliberation, as an action vnworthy the maieſtie of a Pope, and as though it had bene fit that the King ſhould haue come to him to Rome, if he would haue had any conference with him. But the Pope affirmed, that he condeſcended hereunto for a deſire he had to induce the King not to moleſt the Realme of Naples during the life of the King Catholike, which to the iudgement of man could not long endure, for that it was more then a yeare ſince he was very ill diſpoſed. In the meane while Peter of Nauarre was labouring to get the Caſtle of Millan, and hauing won a murdring houſe which ſtood on the right hand at the entrance of that gate of the Caſtle which is towards Coma, and afterwards approching nearer the ditch and the Caſtle wall by the helpe of pauiſſes and engines of wood, he began to worke a mine within the ſaid ditch; and all other defences being ouerthrowne, he began to labour more mines, taking away with the helpe of his Engines a great pane of the wall in a corner of the Caſtle, and applied his hooks and rammes to make it fall at the ſame inſtant that he put fire to his mines: matters which albeit in common iudgement ſeemed not ſufficient to carry the Caſtle but with great difficultie and long time, and that already there was certaine knowledge that the Swiſſers according to that which had bene reſolued at the Diot of Zurich, prepared to ſuccour it: yet a practiſe being begun between Iohn Gonſaga the Duke of Millans Captaine which was within the Caſtle, and the Duke of Bourbon his kinſman, and Ierome Moron, with two other Swiſſer Captaines interpoſing, who were alſo in the Caſtle, the reſolution was concluded the fourth day of October, to the great admiration of all men: and there wanted not ſuch as blamed Ierome Moron ſpecially for this concluſion, for that either through too great feare, or with very litle faith, he had vſed his authoritie to perſwade the Duke to ſuch an agreement: whereof he excuſed himſelfe by the diſcord that was among the footmen of the Swiſſers and Italians. The accord was, that Maximilian Sforce ſhould immediatly giue vp into the hands of the French King, the Caſtles of Millan and Cremona: That he ſhould yeeld vnto him all the rights and intereſts he had in that State, and receiue of the King a certaine proportion of money to pay his debts, and that he ſhould go into France, where the King ſhould giue him a yearely penſion of thirtie thouſand duckats, or procure him to be made Cardinall with the like reuenue: That the King ſhould pardon Galeas Viſconte with certaine other Gentlemen of that Duchie, who had done their beſt endeuours for Maximilian: That he ſhould giue ſixe thouſand crownes to the Swiſſers that were within the Caſtle: That he ſhould confirme to Iohn Gonzaga the goods that he held in the State of Millan by the gift of the Duke, and enlarge his liuing with ſome yearely penſion: That he ſhould in like ſort ratifie to Moron, as well the goods that appertained to him in propertie, as others that he had of the Dukes gift, together with the offices he exerciſed, and ſhould make him Maiſter of Requeſts in the Court of France. Vpon the publication of this accord, Maximilian ſurnamed the More, according to the name of his father, departed out of the Caſtle, and went into France, ſaying, he was deliuered from the ſeruitude of the Swiſſers, the ill dealings of Cæſar, and the deceits of the Spaniards: and yet all men praiſed Fortune more for hauing ſo ſpeedily depoſed him from ſuch a degree, then for that ſhe had afore exalted a man, who, for his incapacitie, extrauagant thoughts, and moſt foule manners of life, was vnworthy of all greatneſſe.

But afore the Caſtle of Millan was giuen vp, there were ſent to the King as Embaſſadours foure of the moſt principall and honorable perſons of the Senate of Venice, to wit, Anthonie Grimani, Dominicke Treuiſan, George Cornaro, and Andrew Gritti, to congratulate his victorie, and to beſeech him to aide them to recouer their townes, as he was bound by the capitulations of the confederation: an enterpriſe wherein they had no other impediments then the forces of Cæſar, and the Popes regiments that were within Verona vnder the charge of Marke Anthonie Colonno: for, the Viceroy after he was gone from the territories of Plaiſance, and had repoſed ſome few dayes vpon the frontiers of Modena, expecting whether the Pope would ratifie the accord with the French King; as ſoone as he heard of the ratification, he returned with all diligence to the Realme of Naples by the way of Romagna. The King gaue ſpeedie order, that the baſtard of Sauoy and Theodore Triuulce ſhould go to their ſuccour with ſixe hundred Lances and ſeuen thouſand Lanceknights: who, whileſt they deferred to depart, either to ſee what would become of the Caſtle of Millan, or for that the King had a meaning to ſend out the ſame bands againſt the Caſtle of Cremona; Aluiano drew with his armie towards Breſſia, for that the Venetians would not conſent that he ſhould follow the Viceroy, becauſe they deſired to recouer Breſſia and Verona (if it were poſſible) without forreine ſouldiers. But becauſe that Citie was newly reſupplied with a thouſand Lanceknights, (Bergamo being rendred to the Venetians many dayes before) Aluiano reſolued to go firſt to beſiege Verona, as being the leaſt fortified, hauing there greater commoditie of victuals; and for that Verona being taken, Breſſia being alone, and the ſituation bearing no oportunitie to be eaſily ſuccoured by the Almaines, was eaſie to be taken. But he forbare to giue beginning to his enterpriſe, for feare leſt the Viceroy and the Popes bands that were in the countries of Reggia and Modena, ſhould repaſſe ouer Po at Oſtia, to reſcue Verona: of which doubt when he was deliuered by the departure of the Viceroy, he fell into another impediment of ſickneſſe, whereof he died in the beginning of October at Gueda in the countrey of Breſſia, hauing not yet attained threeſcore yeares of age. The Venetians were much grieued for his death, but much more the ſouldiers, who being not ſatisfied with grieuing for him, kept his bodie in the armie the ſpace of fiue and twentie dayes, carying it about with them with very great pompe, at ſuch time as they were to march: and when he ſhould be conueyed to Venice, Theodore Triuulce would not ſuffer that ſafeconduct ſhould be demanded of Marke Anthonie Colonno to carry him by the marches of Verona, as many aduiſed him to do; ſaying, it was not conuenient that he who in his life had neuer feare of enemies, ſhould now being dead make ſhew of fearing them. He was buried at Venice by publike decree, with very great honour in S. Stephens Church, where yet remaineth the monument of his ſepulcher; and Andrew Nauaier a very eloquent yong Gentleman of Venice, made his funerall Oration. He was a Captaine (in all mens opinion) of great reſolution and courage, and a diligent executioner of things determined: and yet, either by the malice of fortune, or (as many thinke) for that he was ſudden and raſh in counſell, he receiued many foiles by his enemies; yea haply, when he was ſ chief cõmander in ſ armie, he neuer obtained any victory. By reaſon of the death of Aluiano, the French King being required by the Venetians, gaue to them for Gouernour of their armie, Triuulce, whom they deſired much, as well for his experience, as for his reputation in the ſcience of warre: and withall for that by the common inclination of the faction of the Guelfes, there had bene alwayes a ſetled amitie and goodwill betweene him and that Commonweale. Whileſt he went to the armie, to take his charge, the Venetian bands tooke Peſquiero, but a litle before they ouerthrew certaine troupes of horſemen, and three hundred Spaniſh footmen that went to their reſcue, recouering alſo Aſola and Lona, which the Marquis of Mantua had abandoned. As ſoone as Triuulce was come to the armie, they beſieged Breſſia at the inſtance of the Senate, notwithſtanding it ſeemed a matter of great difficultie to carry it without the French armie, for as much as the towne was ſtrong, and well manned with two thouſand footmen as well Lanceknights as Spaniards, and for that a great number of the Guelfes had bene conſtrained to go away, the Winter alſo drawing on, and the ſeaſon much diſpoſed to raine. Neither did the ſucceſſe of the matter beguile the iudgement that the Generall gaue. For as they had begun to batter the walls with their artilleries, which they had planted vpon the brinke of the ditch, on that ſide where iſſueth the ſmall riuer of Garzetta, thoſe within making many ſallies, brake forth at laſt with fifteene hundred Lanceknights and Spaniards, to charge the guard of the artillerie, which was an hundred men at armes and ſixe thouſand footmen: and beating them alſo with the ſhot that for that end was ranged vpon the towne wall, they put them eaſily to flight, notwithſtanding Iohn Paul Manfron with thirtie men at armes ſuſtained ſomewhat their furie. They ſlue about two hundred footmen, burnt the powders, and drew into Breſſia ten peeces of artilleries: by reaſon of which diſorder, Triuulce thought good to retire and incampe more at large, expecting the coming of the French men, and withdrew himſelfe to Coccaio, which is ten miles from Breſſia, the Venetians looking in the meane while to make new prouiſions of artillerie and munitions. But as ſoone as the French men were come to the campe, they returned to beſiege the towne, and began to batter it in two ſundry places, on that ſide of the gate of Piles towards the Caſtle, and on that ſide of the gate of S. Iohn. In one of thoſe quarters the French men were incamped, and after they had giuen leaue to the Lanceknights, for that they refuſed to do ſeruice againſt the townes of Ceſars obedience, Peter of Nauarre arriued at the campe with fiue thouſand Gaſcons and French men: and in the other quarter lay with the Venetian regiments, Triuulce, in whom reſted almoſt the whole ſuperintendencie of thoſe affaires, for that the baſtard of Sauoy being fallen ſicke, was gone from the army. When they had battered the wall, they went not to the aſſault, for that thoſe within had made ſundry rampiers, and with great care and valour had prouided all things neceſſary for defence: but Peter of Nauarre hauing recourſe to his accuſtomed remedies, began to vndermine the walls. At which time Marke Anthonie Colonno iſſuing out of Verona with ſixe hundred horſemen and fiue hundred footmen, encountred in the plaine Iohn Paul Manfron and Marke Anthonie Bua, who were beſtowed in garriſon within Valeggio with foure hundred men at armes and foure hundred light horſemen, & ouerthrew them: in which skirmiſh was taken Iulio the ſon of Iohn Paul, his horſe being killed vnder him as he fought, and his father fled to Goito. Immediatly after, Marke Anthonie occupied Legnaguo, where were taken priſoners certaine Gentlemen of Venice. At laſt the taking of Breſſia appearing dayly more difficult, for that the mines made by Peter of Nauarre did not anſwer the hopes that he had giuen, and vnderſtanding that eight thouſand footmen were to come out of Germany, which the Captains that lay about Breſſia had no confidence to be able to hinder; the Venetians were content, ſomwhat to couer the ignominy of their retrait, to agree with thoſe within Breſſia, that if they were not ſuccoured within thirtie dayes, they ſhould abandon the Citie, and go out of it with their enſignes diſplayed, their artilleries, and what elſe appertained to them; a promiſe which euery one knew would ſerue to no purpoſe for the aſſurance they had of ſuccours: onely it was a thing profitable to them of Breſſia, to be deliuered in the meane while from aduerſities and afflictions. Afterwards the Venetians put eight thouſand footmen within Bre, a towne ſubiect to the Counts of Lodron; but as ſoone as they heard that the Lanceknights marched, to whom the borough of Anſo was rendred, they retired cowardly to the armie. The Captaines themſelues ſhewed no greater courage; for fearing to be charged at one time by theſe bands, and by thoſe that were within Breſſia, and alſo by Marke Anthonie Colonno with the regiments that were within Verona, they retired to Gueda, whither likewiſe, being already aſſured of this accident, they had ſent their greateſt artillery and almoſt all their baggage: and the Lanceknights that entred into Verona without impediment, returned into Germanie, after they had refurniſhed it with victuals, and reenforced the garriſon.

In

bene diſcerned to be rather raſh and impudent,then honeſt or aduiſed. This man ſounding the intention of the Marquis,entred ſo farre in diſcourſe with him, that they began to ſpeake of cutting in peeces the regiments that remained in the Duchie of Millan, and to make the Marquis King of Naples, if the Pope and the Venetians would be concurrant therein. To which counſell,the Pope being full of doubt and perplexitie, after he was founded by the aduice of Moron, ſhewed himſelfe no whit diſagreeing, although on the other ſide,he aduertiſed the Emperour,vnder colour of friendſhip, that he ſhould keepe his Captaines in good contentment; which he did,not to diſcloſe the practiſe, but to prepare a refuge for himſelfe if the matter ſucceeded not wel.But the Venetians ſhewed themſelues very affectionate hereunto,euery one perſwading themſelues that no leſſe readineſſe of mind would be found in the Ladie Regent, who began to perceiue, that ſince her ſonne was arriued in Spaine, the negociations of his deliuerie were not continued with that facilitie that was looked for. Without doubt theſe counſels had eaſily ſucceeded, if the Marquis of Peſquiero had proceeded ſincerely in this confederation againſt the Emperour.But whether at the firſt the ſaid Marquis gaue eare to this practiſe or not, there was diuerſitie of opinions,euen amongſt the Spaniards, and in the very Court of the Emperour: and many obſeruing the times and euents of affaires, beleeued that at the beginning he had indeed bene concurrant with the reſidue, but that afterwards (conſidering many difficulties that might happen in time, and fearing principally the continuall ſolicitations of the French with the Emperour, and alſo for that it was reſolued that the Ducheſſe of Alenſon ſhould go into Spaine)he made new deliberations: yea ſome do aſſure, that he deferred ſo long to aduertiſe the Emperour of theſe nouelties that were practiſed in Italy, that the Emperour hauing receiued knowledge thereof by Anthonie de Leua and Marino Abbot of Nagera, Commiſſarie in his armie, all the whole Court maruelled at the ſilence of the Marquis. But howſoeuer it was then, it is certaine,that a litle after he ſent John Baptiſta Caſtaldo to the Emperour, and that he manifeſted vnto him all the conſpiracie: and that with his conſent he continued the ſame practiſe; and further, the better to decipher the thoughts of euery man, and to take from them all the meanes to denie that they had conſented thereto, he ſpake himſelfe with the Duke of Millan, and perſwaded Moron to induce the Pope (who a litle before had giuen him the perpetuall gouernment of the Citie of Beneuent, and in whoſe fauour and ſeruice he kept himſelfe as much as he could) to ſend Dominicke Saulo with a letter of credence to conferre with him of that matter.The concluſions of the treatie were theſe: That betweene the Pope, the Realme of France and the gouernments of Italy, ſhould be a league, of which the Marquis of Peſquiero ſhould be Captaine generall: and that firſt he ſhould beſtow the Spaniſh footbands ſeuerally in ſundrie places of the Duchie of Millan, and then drawing to himſelfe ſo many as would follow him, the others ſhould be ſpoiled and put to the ſword; together with Anthonie de Leua, who next to himſelfe was the chiefe man in the armie: and then with the forces of all the Confederates, he ſhould execute the enterpriſe of the kingdome of Naples, whereof the Pope would grant him the inueſtiture. The Marquis ſeemed to find no other difficultie in theſe actions, ſauing that afore he put any thing to triall, he deſired to be ſatisfied,whether without blemiſhing his honour and fidelitie,he might embrace ſuch an enterpriſe in caſe the Pope put it vpon him by his authoritie: whereupon was brought into conſideration, to whom, he (being a Baron and ſubiect of the Realme of Naples) ought to be obedient, either to the Emperour, to whom the profitable iuriſdiction of the Realme appertained by the inueſtiture he had receiued of the Church, or to the Pope, who had direct ſoueraignte ouer it, being abſolute Lord thereof. Vpon which article, both at Millan by the ordinance of Francis Sforce, and at Rome by the appointment of the Pope,were called very ſecret conſultations of excellent Doctors with ſuppreſſion of their true names. Theſe hopes againſt the Emperour were augmented by the offers of the Ladie Regent, who iudging that either neceſſitie,or at leaſt the feare of the Emperour, would aduance much the matters that were treated with him for the deliuerie of her ſonne,ſolicited to take armes,promiſing to ſend into Lombardie fiue hundred Lances, and to be concurrant in the expences of the warre with a great ſumme of money. And Moron ceaſſed not to confirme the minds of the reſidue in this opinion. For,beſides the perſwaſions he made how eaſie it would be, euen without the aide of the Marquis of Peſquiero, to defeate that armie,ſo much diminiſhed in numbers, he promiſed in the Dukes name, that if the Marquis ſhould not ſtand firme in that which had bene debated, that immediatly after order giuen to the other buſineſſe, both he and the other

Cap-

Captaines who went dayly to the Caſtle to conſult, ſhould there be made priſoners. But albeit theſe occaſions ſeemed great, yet they had not bene ſufficient to cauſe the Pope to take armes without the Marquis of Peſquiero, if at the ſame time hearing of the prouiſion ſent to Genes to arme the foure Caricks, he had not likewiſe had ſome intelligence from Spaine of the Emperours inclination to paſſe into Italy; which matter maruellouſly afflicting him, as well in regard of the conditions of the preſent time, as for the ancient diſpoſition of the Popes of Rome, to whom nothing had wont to be more fearfull then the coming of the Emperours armed into Italy, deſiring to meete with this danger, he diſpatched ſecretly into France, with the conſent of the Venetians, to conclude the matters negociated with the Ladie Regent, Sigiſmund Secretarie to Albert Carpy, a fit man, and of ſingular confidence with the Pope: who riding in poſt, was ſlaine in the night by theeues neare the lake of Iſea, in the territories of Breſſia; which accident being kept ſecret many dayes, brought the Pope into great ſuſpition that he was ſecretly taken and ſtayed in ſome place by the appointment of the Imperiall Captaines, and haply by the Marquis himſelfe, whom they began to diſtruſt much for his maner of proceeding, and for the delays which he vſed.

In this eſtate of affaires, arriued the diſpatch giuen by the Emperour to Lopes Vrtado, who remaining ſick in Sauoy, ſent it preſently to Millan by expreſſe meſſengers, with ſ patteut whereby the Marquis of Peſquiero was declared Captaine generall, who to continue with others in the ſame ſemblance, made as though ſuch a charge was not very plauſible to him, and yet he accepted it immediatly. And the ſaid Lopes ſent alſo to the Pronotarie Caracciol, the commiſſion to go to Venice in the Emperours name, to induce the Senate to a new confederation, or at leaſt that all men might know what deſire the Emperour had to liue in peace with all men. Francis Sforce who was fallen into a very dangerous diſeaſe, accepted the inueſtiture of the Duchie, and payed for it fiftie thouſand duckats, but ceaſſed not for all that to continue the practiſes begun with the Marquis. The opinions were diuers touching this diſpatch of the Emperour: for ſome beleeued that he had ſimply determined to aſſure the Italians: and others iudged, that for feare of new ſtirres he ſought to hold men in ſuſpence with diuers hopes, and to proceed alwayes winning of time, in agreeing to the inueſtiture, and in appearance granting a commiſſion ſo agreeable to all Italy, to cauſe his armie to retire; though on the other ſide he had giuen direction to his Captaines not to ſtirre. Yea and there were ſome that had this opinion, that he had intelligence from the Marquis of the practiſes entertained with Moron, and therefore that he ſent ſuch a commiſſion, not to be obeyed, but to get ſome iuſtification, and with theſe hopes to lull mens minds aſleepe, vntill he ſaw fit time to execute his purpoſes. In which diuerſitie, it being verie hard to know the ſimple truth, ſeeing withall it was not knowne whether Lopes Vrtado was diſpatched at the ſame time that Iohn Baptiſta Caſtaldo, ſent by the Marquis to aduertiſe the Emperour of the negociation, arriued at the Court: yet conſidering what courſe the Emperour hath taken ſince in many things, it is without doubt that he is leſſe deceiued that holds for true the better and more eaſie interpretation. In the meane while the Marquis ceaſſed not to entertaine Moron and the others with the ſame hopes, deferring notwithſtanding the execution with many excuſes: wherein he tooke one occaſion of the ſickneſſe of the Duke of Millan, who was growne ſo weake, that euery one held almoſt for certaine that he would die. For all the Captaines pretending that in ſuch a caſe that Eſtate ſhould returne to the Emperour, as ſoueraigne Lord in chiefe, he was not onely not permitted to retire the armie, but alſo was conſtrained to call in a new ſtrength of two thouſand Lanceknights, and alſo to take order that there might be a greater number in readineſſe: ſo that the ſoldiers being ſo puiſſant in the Duchie of Millan, there was no meanes either to diſſolue them, or to offend them: and he gaue hope to execute the counſels of the conſpiracie as ſoone as time would ſerue; in expectation whereof he ſaid he would proceed with great reſpect to the Pope; and to gratifie him, he leuied from off the Eſtates of the Church the garriſons, whereof he complained much. But at the ſame time almoſt all things were changed by a new accident which happened in Spaine. For the French King being much diſpleaſed that he had in vaine deſired the preſence of the Emperour, fell, by a ſickneſſe which tooke him in the Caſtle of Madril, into ſuch extremitie and danger of his life, that the Phyſitions appointed for his cure, told the Emperour, that they had no hope of his recouerie, if he himſelfe in perſon came not to comfort him, and giue him ſome hope of his deliuerie: and as he prepared himſelfe to go vnto him, his high Chancellor endeuoured to diſſwade him from it, and and told him that it ſtood not with his honour to go, vnleſſe it were with intention to deliuer him preſently, and without any couenant: and that otherwiſe it would be a humanitie not royall but mercenarie, and a deſire to recouer him, not moued of charitie, but puſhed on by his proper intereſt, to the end not to loſe by his death the occaſion of the profit hoped for by the victorie; a counſell indeed memorable, and worthy to be followed by ſo great a Prince: and yet others counſelling otherwiſe, he took poſt & went vnto him. The viſitation was ſhort, for that the Moſt Chriſtian King was now almoſt at the extremitie; yet for the time full of gracious words, and of moſt certaine hope that he would deliuer him as ſoone as he had recouered his health: and whatſoeuer was the cauſe, either the comfort that he gaue him, or his youth, which of it ſelfe was ſtronger then the maladie, he began after this viſitation to find himſelfe ſo much refreſhed, that within a few dayes he was out of danger, although he could not recouer his former health but with longer time. And now neither the difficulties that were ſhewed on the Emperours ſide, nor the hopes which were giuen by the Italians, could ſtay the voyage of the Ladie Alenſon into Spaine: for that nothing was more hard to the French men then to leaue off the practiſes of accord begun with thoſe that had power to reſtore their King, and nothing more eaſie to the Emperour, then by giuing hope to the French, to diuert their minds from taking of armes, and by that meanes to keepe the Italians in ſuſpence, ſo that they had not the courage to enterpriſe any new thing: and thus, ſometimes vſing delayes, and ſometimes preſſing forward the affaires, to keepe the minds of all men confuſed and intangled. The Ladie Alenſon was receiued by the Emperour with very gracious demonſtrations and hopes, but the effects fell out both hard and difficult: for when ſhe had ſpoken to him the foureteenth day of October, for the mariage of his ſiſter the widow with the King, he made anſwer, that it was a matter which could not be done without the conſent of the Duke of Bourbon: and other particularities were debated by the deputies of both parts, the Emperour inſiſting obſtinately to haue the Duchie of Burgondie reſtored, as appertaining to him: but the French men conſented not, vnleſſe he would either accept it for dowrie, or referre it to the ſentence of the law, to decide to whom it belonged. They could eaſily haue agreed to the reſt, but becauſe they were ſo farre different in regard of Burgondie, the Ladie Alenſon returned at laſt into France, without hauing gotten any other thing then leaue to ſee the King her brother; who growing more and more into diſtruſt of his deliuerie, deſired her (as they ſay) at her departure, to admoniſh his mother and all the Councell from him, to looke carefully to the profite of the Crowne of France, without hauing any conſideration of him, as if he liued not: and yet for the departing of the Ladie Alenſon, the ſolicitations for the Kings deliuerie were not altogether layed aſide, for that the Preſident of Paris and the Biſhops of Ambrun and Tarbe remained behind, who had followed the matter till then, but with very litle hope, for that the Emperour would not hearken to any condition, if Burgondie were not firſt rendred, which the King would not conſent to giue him, but in a laſt neceſſitie. At this time the Cardinall Saluiati the Popes Legate arriued at the Court, where being receiued of the Emperour with great honour, he debated vpon his commiſſions, which principally contained the ratification of the articles promiſed by the Viceroy, and that for the common ſafetie of Italy, the inueſtiture might be giuen to the Duke of Millan. But the ſame Viceroy diſſwaded the reſtitution of Reggia and Rubiera, by the counſel and hopes of whom the Duke of Ferrara, who deſired to ſolicite his owne cauſe before the Emperour, when the Pope had promiſed him not to execute any enterpriſe vpon his Eſtate for ſixe moneths, tooke his way to the frontier of the Realme of France, with intention to paſſe further; but the Ladie Regent refuſing to giue him ſafeconduct, he returned backe againe to Ferrara. There was debated alſo betweene the Pope and the Emperour, touching a diſpenſation to take to wife the King of Portugals ſiſter, a mariage which the Emperour was determined to contract, notwithſtanding he had alreadie promiſed the King of England by oath, that he would take no other wife then his daughter. But the Pope ſtood long to accord to this diſpenſation, for that many perſwaded him, that the deſire to obtaine ſuch a grace, would make the Emperour more tractable to his deſires touching the matters in negociation: and that at leaſt in caſe he would make warre vpon him, it ſhould be very vnwiſely done, to giue him meanes to heape together ſo great a maſſe of money as would grow to him by that mariage, for that the King of Portugal offered him for a dowrie nine hundred thouſand duckats; of which, deducting ſo much as was ſet downe to defray the debts contracted betweene them, it was thought there would come to his hands

hands at leaſt a ſumme of fiue hundred thouſand duckats; beſides the foure hundred thouſand which his ſubiects of Spaine offered to giue him, vnder the title of a beneuolence or ſeruice, which taking beginning in time paſt of the proper wils of the people to relieue the neceſſities of their Kings, was reduced into an ordinarie Subſidie: and beſides, they offered alſo to giue him foure hundred thouſand duckats, if he went through with the mariage. On the other ſide, the Pope could not reſiſt the importunities of the Duke of Seſſa the Emperours Embaſſadour, for that there was almoſt alwayes in him great repugnancie betweene that he purpoſed and that which he executed: for being by nature much eſtranged from granting any grace that was demanded of him, he could not vſe difficulties, nor conſtantly make deniall, but oftentimes he ſuffered his will to be ouerruled by the importunitie of ſuch as ſued to him; and that in ſuch ſort, that it ſeemed many times that he accorded to things more through feare then by grace, wherein he proceeded neither with that conſtancie nor maieſtie, which the greatneſſe of his dignitie and the importance of the affaires that were negociated did require. And thus it hapned in the diſpenſation which the Emperour required, that his proper profite ſtriuing in him on the one ſide, and on the other his facilitie, he layed vpon the backe of another (as he often vſed to do) that which it is not well knowne whether he had the boldneſſe or courage to ſuſtaine. He diſpatched by a Briefe the diſpenſation in the ſame forme the Emperour demanded it, and ſent it to the Cardinall Saluiati, with commiſſion, that if he had made a reſolution of his affaires with the Emperour, according to the hope he had giuen him, as ſoone as the ſaid Cardinall ſhould come to the Court, he ſhould deliuer the Briefe, but otherwiſe to retaine it; which was a commiſſion wherein the ſeruant (as ſhall be ſaid in his place) ſhewed himſelfe neither more firme nor more conſtant, then the maiſter had bene.

Deſcription of the nature of Pope Clement.

But whileſt the Cardinall debated the Popes commiſſions with the Emperour, and was alwayes entertained with hope to haue the expedition he deſired, there fell out in Lombardie very diuers effects. For the Duke of Millan being ſo well recouered of his ſickneſſe, that it was holden for certaine, that he was out of danger of ſudden death, the Marquis of Peſquiero hauing receiued by the ſame Caſtaldo commiſſion from the Emperour to prouide for thoſe dangers as he thought good, determined to enter vpon the Duchie of Millan, vnder this colour, that the Duke by reaſon of the conſpiracies and practiſes holden by Moron, was fallen from the rights of inueſtiture, and the freehold reuerted to the Emperour as ſupreme Lord. Therefore the Marquis, who was at Nouaro, although very ſicke, and had beſtowed part of the armie within Pauie, and lodged the Lanceknights neare Loda; which two Cities he had cauſed to be fortified, he reuoked to Nouaro (when there was leaſt doubt, and vnder colour to diſpoſe the armie through all the Eſtate of Millan) the reſidue of the bands diſperſed in Piedmont and the Marquiſdome of Saluſſa, which the Imperiall Captaines had occupied almoſt immediatly after the victorie. He called alſo Ierome Moron to Nouaro, in whoſe perſon the importance of all things might be ſaid to reſt, for as much as it was certaine that Moron being made priſoner, the Duke of Millan, depriued of men and counſell, could make no reſiſtance, whereas remaining at libertie, the Marquis might feare that he might trouble him much, with his wit, experience, and reputation, and giue many impediments to his deſignes. Beſides, it was neceſſarie for the Emperour to haue the perſon of Moron in his power and poſſeſſion, who had bene the author and inſtrument of all the conſpiracies, to the end to proue by his confeſſion, that wherewith the Duke of Millan was to be charged. There is nothing more hard to auoide then iuſtice, neither can any remedie auaile againſt the euils that muſt fall vpon vs. Moron might now diſcerne that the practiſe entertained with the Marquis was vaine, that he was much hated of all the Spaniſh ſouldiers, amongſt whom ranne alreadie many rumours of his infidelitie; and he knew that Anthony de Leua gaue out publike threats that he would kill him: it is very likely that he conſidered not the importance of his perſon, and that he diſcerned not to what eſtate the Duke of Millan was reduced, being then vnprofitable, and as it were dead: all things were in ſuſpence and full of ſuſpition betweene them many dayes before: euery one counſelled him not to go thither: himſelfe was full of doubt: and yet either for that his mind was troubled with the faire ſemblances of the Marquis, or ſetting vp his reſt vpon the great amitie that ſeemed to be betweene them, or repoſing confidence in his faith, which afterwards he aſſured he had receiued by a letter ſubſigned with his hand, or laſtly being puſhed on by that fatall neceſſitie which draweth on men that will not be led, he reſolued to go as it were to a manifeſt priſon; a matter ſo much the more wonderfull derfull vnto me, by how much I haue often heard Moron say in the armie in the time of Pope Leo, that in all Italy there was not a more impious and disloyall man then the Marquis of Pesquiero. The Marquis receiued him graciously, and they spake together alone of the former conspiracies, in a chamber apart, both how to kill the Spaniards, and to murder Anthonie de Leua, whom the Marquis had secretly caused to be hidden behind a peece of Tapestrie, to heare all that should be spoken: but as soone as he was gone from the Marquis (which was the foureteenth day of October) Anthonie de Leua apprehended him prisoner, and sent him to the Castle of Pauie, whither the Marquis himselfe went to examine him vpon the matters they had debated together, and Moron confessed from point to point the whole conspiracie, charging the Duke of Millan both as guiltie and consenting to all that had passed, which was the matter that principally was sought. Ierome Moron being prisoner, the Marquis who had in his hands already Loda and Pauie, required of the Duke that for the suretie of the Emperours Estate he should deliuer vp to him Cremona and the Castles of Trezzo, Lecquo, and Pisqueton, places supposed to be the keyes of the Duchie of Millan, for that they haue their situation vpon the passage of Adda, promising when he had them to introduce no more innouation. The Duke finding himselfe depriued of all things, and abandoned of counsell and hope, caused them to be presently deliuered. When he had them, he proceeded further, and demanded that he might be admitted and receiued into Millan to speake with him, as he alledged; which was granted him with the same facilitie: and when he was entred into Millan, he sent vnto him to make instance, that he would cause the Castle of Cremona to be deliuered vnto him; and that he would not demand the Castle of Millan, as being a request not reasonable, for that his person was lodged within it, but that he would require, for the suretie of the Emperours armie, that he would consent that the Castle might be enuironed with trenches. He required of him also to haue deliuered into his hands Iohn Angeo Riccio, his Secretarie, and Politian Secretarie to Moron, to the end they might be examined of that wherewith they were charged to haue conspired against the Emperour. To which demands the Duke answered: That he held the Castles of Millan and Cremona in the name and at the instance of the Emperour, to whom he had alwayes bene a most faithfull vassall, and that he would not deliuer them vp to any, vntill he first vnderstood his pleasure; for the better knowledge whereof, he would forthwith send an expresse messenger vnto him, so that the Marquis would giue him suretie of passage: and that he held it not conuenient to consent to be inclosed in the meane while in the Castle, from which violence he would defend himselfe with all his power: That he could not depart with Iohn Angeo, who was instructed in all his affaires of importance, and at that time the onely man about him: That he had greater need also of the Secretarie of Moron, to the end to present him before the Emperour, and by that meanes to proue, that whilest he was sicke, his maister had dispatched in his name, and without his priuitie many expeditions, wherewith he might be charged, if by that meanes he iustified not his innocencie, and shewed that the practises of Moron were farre different and separate from his practises. But the effect was, that after many replies and protestations past by writing, as well by the one as the other partie, the Marquis compelled the people of Millan to passe an oath of fidelitie to the Emperour, placed officers euery where in the name of the Emperour, to the great discontent of all men; and began with trenches to incompasse the Castles of Cremona and Millan, in the which the Duke was resolued to remaine with eight hundred choise footmen which he had there, and with such store of victuals as in so short time he could prouide: and that because of the great comforts and hopes of succours which were giuen him by the Pope and the Venetians, not failing to hinder with the artilleries as much as he could the working of the trenches which were made without, and of more distance from the Castle then those which Prosper Colonno had made. All Italy was much astonished, and that with good reason, for the vsurpation of the Dukedome of Millan, knowing well that it would fall into manifest seruitude, whensoeuer an Emperour should be Lord ouer Millan and Naples. But aboue all others the Pope was maruellously afflicted, perceiuing those practises to be disclosed, wherewith he had intended not onely to assure Millan, but also to destroy the Emperours armie, and to take from him the kingdome of Naples. Touching the Marquis of Pesquiero, it may be he wonne great fauour with the Emperour, but with all others he purchased perpetuall infamie, not onely for the opinion that most men conceiued of him that in the beginning he had an intention to play false with the Emperor, and to bandie against him, but also for that although he had alwayes bene faithfull vnto him, yet all men esteemed it a matter full of great infamie, to haue encouraged men, and with so great deceit and double dealing, to haue allured them to make conspiracies with him, to get occasion to discouer them, and make himselfe great by the transgressions of others, solicited with feigned words and subtilties. This alteration made difficult the hope of accord that was negociated with the Senate of Venice by the Pronotary Caracciol. The Pronotary hoped (for the termes wherein things stood) that the Senate would speedily draw to a conclusion to renew the former confederation with the same conditions: and that he should pay to the Emperour fowe-score thousand duckats, in recompence for that in times past he had withdrawne his aide, leauing off wholly all demands to contribute hereafter with money: but the accident of Millan which happened, filled the Senate with great perplexitie. For on the one side it grieued them much to be the onely people in Italy against the Emperour with danger, seeing the Marquis of Pesquiero threatned them to cause the warre to be transported vpon their Estate, whereof they discerned already certaine preparations: and on the other side, they were not ignorant that in case the accord went through, the Emperour should with greater facilitie make himselfe absolute Lord of that Duchie, which being ioyned to so many Estates, and so many other oportunities, was a degree to subdue them, together with all the residue of Italy; a matter which was continually declared to them by the Bishop of Bayeux, whom the Ladie Regent had sent to debate of her vnion with the Italians against the Emperor: and in so great a doubt and so dangerous a straight, they made many assemblies, but without any resolution, by reason of the diuersitie of opinions. And albeit to accept the accord was a thing more conformable to their custome, for as much as that put them out of present dangers, so that they might haue hope in the length of time, and the occasions which follow Commonweales, which in comparison of Princes are immortall; yet it seemed to them a matter of too great importance, that the Emperour should confirme himselfe in the estate of Millan, and that the French should be excluded from all hope to haue any alliance in Italy. Therefore after they had at last resolued to be bound to nothing, they made this answer to the Pronotarie Caracciol: That their actions past made knowne to all the world, and he himselfe being present at the conclusion of the confederation, could well testifie, how much they had alwayes desired the amitie of the Emperour, with whom they had contracted a confederation at such a time, as if they had hearkned to the French, it had bene (as all the world knew) a matter of right great consequence; and that they had alwayes perseuered and would continue now more then euer in the same disposition, but by necessitie they were held in suspence, for that they saw in Lombardie changes and innouations of so great importance; and specially for the remembrance that their confederation with the Emperour, together with so many sturres happened that yeare in Italy, had bene to no other end, then to transferre to Francis Sforce the Duchie of Millan, as the principall foundation of the libertie and suretie of Italy; and therefore they besought his Maiestie, that herein maintaining himselfe and his goodnesse, he would remoue this innouation, and establish the tranquillitie of Italy, as it was in his power to do, for as much as he should find them alwayes very ready, both with their authoritie and their forces, to follow so holy an inclination; and would neuer giue him cause to desire of them any kind of dutie, as well in respect of the vniuersall good, as of his particular interests. Which answer being without any hope of conclusion, bred not for all that any ouerture of warre: for that both the sicknesse of the Marquis of Pesquiero, who was dayly worse and worse, and the desire to impatronize himselfe first of the whole Estate of Millan, and to establish and assure that conquest, together with the desire of the Emperour to put an end to so many other affaires which he had in hand, would not suffer him to giue beginning to an enterprise of so great consequence.

About this time the Duke of Bourbon passed into Spaine, who arriued at the Emperors Court the fifteenth day of Nouember; touching whom we must not forget to write, that albeit the Emperour receiued him with all ſ demonstrations and honors that could be, and that he entertained him as his brother in law, yet all the Lords of the Court, who are accustomed in all other things ordinarily to follow the example of their Prince, abhorred him as a person infamous, stiling him traitor to his owne King: and which more is, one of them being required in the Emperours name to lend his pallace to lodge him in, answered in the stout courage of a Spaniard, that he could not denie the Emperour whatsoeuer he would demand of him, but that he should well vnderstand, that as soone as Bourbon was gone out of it, he would burne it, as a pallace in-feated with the infamie of Bourbon, and vnworthy to be inhabited by men of honour. But the honors done by the Emperour to the Duke of Bourbon, increased the distrust of the French men, who (both for this, and more for the returne of the Ladie Alanson without effect, hauing litle hope in the accord, notwithstanding it was continually negociated by men expresse which they had about the Emperour) laboured as much as they could to aduance the league with the Pope: wherein did concurre the perswasions and authoritie of the King of England, and the redoubled and vehement instances of the Venetians; whereunto was added an oportunitie, without doubt of great consequence, that about that time (which was the beginning of December) the Marquis of Pesquiero died, haply by the iust iudgement of God, who would not suffer him to enioy the fruite of that seed which he had sowne with so great malignitie. He was of the house of Aualos, originally of Catelano, whose predecessors came into Italy with Alphonse King of Aragon, who was the first of that house which made conquest of the kingdome of Naples; and beginning at the battell of Rauenna, where, being very yong he was taken prisoner, he was present in all the wars which the Spaniards had in Italy: in so much as though he had not passed the age of sixe and thirtie yeares, yet he was old in experience, ingenious, resolute, very carefull, circumspect and aduised, and much esteemed and loued of the Infanterie of Spaine, ouer whom he had long bene Colonell: so that the victorie of Pauie, and all other memorable actions executed by that armie since certaine yeares, had principally succeeded by his counsell and vertue. He was assuredly a Captaine of great valour, but one who with art and faire shewes knew how to grace his doings, being herewithall proud, deceitfull, malignant, without any sinceritie, and worthy, as oftentimes he desired, to haue Spaine for his countrey rather then Italy. His death therefore put the whole armie into great confusion, with whom he was in such fauour and reputation, and gaue hope to others the more easily to oppresse it, since they had lost a Captaine of so great authoritie and valour: and therefore the instances of such as desired that the league might be accomplished, were more vehement and importunate with the Pope: but the doubts which detained him were nothing lesse, and that for iust cause, since on all sides verie strong reasons troubled his mind, and such as might hold confused and in suspence any man right actiue and resolute, and not Pope Clement alone, who proceeded alwayes in his affaires slowly and with much doubt. There was no further expectation from the Emperour of any deliberation which might assure Italy, and he was discerned vehemently to solicite the taking of the Castle of Millan; which being taken all others, and chiefly the Pope, whose Estate was weake, and situate betweene Lombardie and the Realme of Naples, remained a manifest prey vnto him: and presupposing that it were in the power of the Emperour to oppresse the Pope, it was much to be doubted lest he would do it, either for ambition, which is almost naturall in the Emperours against the Popes, or for his owne suretie, or to reuenge himselfe, being full of disdaine and distrust, as it was thought, for the conspiracies which he entertained with the Marquis of Pesquiero: and if the necessitie to prouide for this danger was great, the foundations and hopes to do it seemed not light, but such, as if the remedie could not succeed by the meanes of so mightie a league and vnion, it was vtterly to be despaired of. The Regent of France promised fiue hundred Lances, and to contribute for euery moneth so long as the warre should endure, fortie thousand duckats, with the which it was intended to wage ten thousand Swissers. The Pope and the Venetians together, were to leuie eighteene hundred men at armes, twentie thousand footmen, and two thousand light horsemen. The French men and the Venetians were to take the sea with a great nauie to assaile Genes or the Realme of Naples. The Ladie Regent promised to begin warre immediatly vpon the frontiers of Spaine with a strong armie, to the end to hinder the Emperour for sending of men and money for the warre in Italy. The armie that remained in Lombardie was not great, and had not Captaines of such authoritie as was accustomed, the Marquis being dead, and the Duke of Bourbon and the Viceroy of Naples in Spaine: they were without meanes to recouer money, and had no plentie of victuals: the inhabitants were great enemies to them, for the desire of their Duke, and for the intollerable exactions made by the souldiers in the Citie of Millan and elsewhere: the Castles of Millan and Cremona were holden for the Duke: and the Venetians gaue hope that the Duke of Ferrara would also enter into this confederation, if the Pope would be content to yeeld him Reggio, which by one meanes or other he had alwayes possessed. But on the other side, that which made the matter more difficult, was the subtiltie and vertue of the enemies, who vsed (when need required) to maintaine themthemſelues a long time with litle money, and to endure many neceſſities and diſcommodities the townes which they held being wel fortified, and the facilitie no leſſe to reduce them to better ſtrength with rampiers, and other ſort of fortifications, for that they were townes ſituate in the plaine countrey: wherein they were able to entertaine themſelues vntill there came vnto them out of Germanie a ſufficient ſuccour to reduce all the warre to the fortune of a battell: and whilſt the ſouldiers of the league could be no other but new and vntrained men, in compariſon of that armie reſolute and nouriſhed in ſo many victories: and beſides they wanted a Captaine generall, for that the Marquis of Mantua who was then Captaine of the Church, was not able to ſuſtaine ſo great a charge; neither could they with any ſuretie commit themſelues to the fidelitie of the Duke of Ferrara nor the Duke of Vrbin, whom they had ſo much offended, and who could not be well pleaſed with the greatneſſe of the Pope: and alſo the armes and weapons of the Church had but dull edges, and not much better thoſe of the Venetians: and, if either of them apart were bad, how much worſe being conioyned together? conſidering withall, that in the armies of leagues, prouiſions are ſeldome ſeene to arriue at conuenient times; and among ſuch diuerſitie of minds, where there are diuers intereſts and ſundrie ends, diſorders, diſdaines, diſcontentments and diſtruſts do eaſily happen, and neuer any readineſſe reſolutely to follow the fauour of fortune when ſhe ſhewes her ſelfe benigne, nor a diſpoſition to reſiſt her conſtantly when ſhe is aduerſe. But that which in this deliberation cauſed moſt feare and difficultie, was a ſuſpition leſt the French men, whenſoeuer the Emperor ſeeing himſelf conſtrained, ſhould offer them to deliuer their King, would not onely abandon the league, but alſo aide the Emperour againſt the Confederates: and albeit the King of England gaue his faith for them, that they ſhould not accord thereunto, and that it was negociated that they ſhould giue aſſurance in Rome, Florence, or Venice for three moneths pay, yet there was no meanes found to aſſure this ſuſpition. For the French men hauing no other end then to recouer their King, and it being manifeſt that they had no inclination to the warre vntill they ſaw no hope to effect the accord, it was a thing very likely, that whenſoeuer the Emperour ſhould conſent, they would preferre the accord with him afore all other regards and intereſts. And likewiſe it was well knowne, that by how much were great the preparations and forces of the league, by ſo much more would the Emperour be inclined to compound with the French King: and therefore it ſeemed a very dangerous matter to enter into confederation to make a warre in the which the ſtrong prouiſions of the Confederates might as well hurt as helpe. With theſe reaſons did the Embaſſadours and Agents of the Princes labour the Pope on all ſides, and no leſſe his owne ſeruants, for that his Court and thoſe of his Councell were deuided, each of whom fauoured euery one his owne inclination, with ſo much the leſſe regard, by how much the greater they eſteemed their authoritie to be with him, who till that time was accuſtomed to ſuffer himſelfe to be caried for the moſt part by the will of ſuch as in reaſon ought to haue obeyed the twinkling of his eye, and to be nothing elſe but miniſters and executers of the will and commandements of their Lord: for the better knowledge whereof, and of many other occurrences, it is neceſſary to declare the matter more at large.

Leo who brought the ſoueraigne Eccleſiaſtical dignitie into the houſe of the Medices, & being Cardinall, did ſo well ſupport both himſelfe and that family, which was fallen from a high degree into much declination, that they might expect the returne of a proſperous fortune, was a man very liberall, if this name be fit for ſuch an exceſſiue expence as is without all meaſure. In this man at ſuch time as he was choſen Pope, there was ſeene ſuch magnificence and maieſtie, and courage indeed royall, as might ſeeme wonderfull euen in one that by long ſucceſſion had deſcended of Kings and Emperours: and he was not onely prodigall of money, but alſo of all the fauours that are in the power of a Pope, the which he granted ſo vnmeaſurably, that he made the ſpirituall authoritie vile, diſordered the courſe of the Court, and by his too great expences, brought himſelfe into neceſſitie to ſeeke mony always by extraordinary meanes. This great facilitie was accompanied with a moſt deepe diſſimulation, with the which he beguiled all the world in the beginning of his Pontificacie: and that which made him ſeeme a good Prince (I ſpeake not of Apoſtolike goodneſſe, for that in thoſe corrupted times, the goodneſſe of the Pope is praiſed, when it exceeds not the malignitie of other men) was the opinion that was conceiued of his clemencie, and that he deſired to do good to all men, without doing harme to any man. Amongſt his other felicities which were very great, it was no litle happineſſe to him to haue about him Iulio de Medicis his couſin, whom (notwithſtanding he was not borne in lawfull mariage) he made Cardinall, being before a Knight of the Order of Rhodes. For Iulio being by nature graue, diligent, laborious in affaires, not giuen to his pleaſure, but ordered and regular in all things, and hauing vnder his hands by the will of Pope Leo the adminiſtration of all the affaires of importance of the Popedome, did beare out and moderate many diſorders which proceeded of his bountie and facilitie: and which more is, not following the cuſtome of all the other couſins and brethren of the Pope, he preferred the honour and greatneſſe of Leo, afore all the means he might vſe for his own good after the Popes death, & was very faithful & obedient vnto him, ſo that he ſeemed to be indeed a ſecond himſelfe: by reaſon whereof he was dayly more aduãced by the Pope, who put him continually more in truſt with his affaires; which being in the hands of two natures ſo different, did ſhew how well the mixture of two contraries doth oftentimes agree together, the aſſiduitie, diligence, order, grauitie of manners of the one, with the facilitie, prodigalitie, pleaſures and merrineſſe of the other: which things made many beleeue, that Leo was gouerned by Iulio, and that of himſelfe he was not able to rule ſo great a charge, nor to hurt any one, but rather deſirous to enioy the commodities of the Popedome: and on the contrary, that Iulio was of a ſpirit ambitious, ſtirring, and addicted to innouations: ſo that it was deemed, that all the rigours, all the ſtirres and enterpriſes of Leos time, proceeded from the inſtigation of Iulio, who was reputed a man malicious, but of great ſpirit: which opinion of his valour was confirmed and increaſed after the death of Leo, for that amidſt infinite contradictions and difficulties which befell him, he ſupported his affaires with ſuch a dignitie, that he ſeemed almoſt a Pope, and ſo conſerued his authoritie with the Cardinals, that making his entrie into two Conclaues abſolute commander of ſixteene voices, he was at laſt after the death of Adrian made Pope, within two yeares after the death of Pope Leo, notwithſtanding the infinite contradictions of the moſt part, and chiefly of the more ancient of the Colledge: and he entred into his Popedome with ſuch an expectation, that it was thought he would become the greateſt Pope, and do greater things then euer did any that till that day had ſate in that ſeate. But it was found out afterwards how farre men were deceiued in their iudgements, as well of Leo as of him, for that Clement had many conditions much differing from that which men beleeued of him before: ſeeing there was not in him either that deſire of innouation, or that greatneſſe of courage and inclination of mind to noble and high enterpriſes, which was ſuppoſed before; and that he had rather bene about Leo an executer of his deſignes, then a director and introducer of his owne counſels and deſires. And albeit he had a very capable wit, and a deepe inſight in all the affaires of the world, yet when he muſt come to reſolution and execution, he was not correſpondent to himſelfe, for that he was not onely hindered by a timiditie of mind which was not litle in him, and by a deſire of ſparing, but alſo by a certaine irreſolution and perplexitie, which was naturall in him: ſo that he ſtood in ſuſpence and doubt, when he was vpon the point to eſtabliſh things which he had aforetime with great foreſight conſidered and almoſt reſolued: whereby it happened, that as well in his deliberations, as in the execution of his proiects, euery ſmall reſpect newly happening, and euery light impediment that he met withall, ſeemed ſufficient to cauſe him to returne into the ſame confuſion wherein he was afore he determined, being alwayes perſwaded that after he had conſulted, that counſell was the beſt which he had reiected. For then, calling to mind thoſe reaſons onely whereof he had made no reckoning, he reuoked not into his minde the arguments which had moued him to make the election, the which being debated and compared with the contraries, would haue weakened their force; and was not careful not to ſuffer himſelfe to be ſurmounted by feare, by experience of himſelfe, who ought to remember, that he had often bene fearefull in vaine, and without any occaſion: in which confuſed nature, and diſorderly maner of proceeding, ſuffering himſelfe oftentimes to be tranſported by his ſeruants, he ſeemed rather to be led then counſelled by them. Of theſe, Nicholas Scõberg a German, & Iohn Mathew Gibert a Genoway, were of great authoritie with him: for Scomberg was reuerenced and almoſt feared of the Pope, and Gibert much loued and fauoured: Scomberg who was a diſciple of Ierome Sauonarola, became a preaching Frier whileſt he ſtudied the lawes, but afterwards leauing his religion and profeſſion, and retaining onely the habite and the name, he became a follower of State matters: Gibert had bene beſtowed very yong in the function of religion, but afterwards he left that vocation by the conſent of his father, notwithſtanding he was not borne in lawfull mariage, and diſclaimed as well the habite as the name of his profeſſion. They agreed well together whileſt he was Cardinall, and alſo in the beginning and entrie to his Popedome, ſo that they cauſed him to do whatſoeuer they would: but beginning afterwards to diſagree, either through ambition, or by the diuerſitie of their natures, they vndid him, and brought him into great confuſion. For, Frier Nicholas either becauſe he was a Germane, or for ſome other regard, being much affected to the name of the Emperour, and naturally obſtinate and reſolute in his opinions, which oftentimes were different from the iudgment of others, the Pope entred many times into doubt of him, as if he loued more the profit of others then his owne. And touching the other, he affected no man but the Pope, nor acknowledged any other Lord, and naturally tooke his affaires to heart. And albeit in the time of Leo he had bene a great enemie to the French, and had fauored the affaires of the Emperour, yet after the death of Leo he was quite altered. Thus theſe two officers of the Pope, who were in great credite with him, being at manifeſt diſcord betweene themſelues, proceeded not diſcreetly, nor with any reſpect to the honour of the Pope; and being the cauſe that all men knew how irreſolute and weake the Pope was, they made him contemptible and almoſt ridiculous to moſt men: and thus he being alreadie by nature irreſolute, knew not which way to turne himſelfe in a deliberation ſo ſlipperie and difficult, ſeeing thoſe who ought to aide him to reſolue himſelfe, were the men that put him into greater confuſion. Neuertheleſſe at the laſt, more by neceſſitie to deliberate ſomething, then by reſolution or firme iudgement, and chiefly for that he found himſelfe in ſuch termes, that to deliberate nothing, was a kind of deliberation, he inclined to go through with the League, and in companie of the reſidue to begin the warre againſt the Emperour. They fell to accord, and drew the articles, and there wanted nothing but to giue the full perfection, at ſuch time as he receiued newes that the Commander Errera whō the Emperor had ſent to him, was arriued at Genes, and that he was coming with diligence with a gracious and good diſpatch; in which reſpect he determined to attend his coming, whereof the Embaſſadours, whom he had aſſured to paſſe the confederation the ſame day, complained much. The cauſe of his coming was, that the Emperour after he had ſent ſuch a commiſſion to the Marquis of Peſquiero, that at leaſt it was in his power to ſeize vpon the Eſtate of Millan, fearing leſt by that occaſion new ſtirres would be raiſed in Italy, he began to debate more ſtraitly of the accord with the Legate Saluiati, ſo that there paſſed betweene them a capitulation, reſeruing neuertheleſſe the condition of the ratification by the Pope, wherein he was ſatisfied touching the reſtitution of Reggio and Rubiera, and alſo the defence and conſeruation of the Duke of Millan was comprehended therein; matters which the Pope did principally deſire. And it was expreſly ſet downe, that if the Duke ſhould die, the Emperour ſhould not retaine that Dukedome, nor giue it to the Archduke his brother, but that he ſhould inueſt the Duke of Bourbon, which the Pope himſelfe very vndiſcreetly, and by the perſwaſion of the Archbiſhop of Capua, had propounded vnto them, together with George of Auſtria baſtard brother to the Emperour Maximilian, at ſuch time as the life of Francis Sforce was holden almoſt deſperate. Which capitulation being made, the Legate without tarrying till Pope Clement had giuen it perfection, either could not, or would not refuſe to preſent the Emperour with the writ of diſpenſation ſo much deſired: ỹ which for that it was made before, onely with mention of impediment to the ſecond degree without naming the King of Portugals daughter, the leſſe to offend the King of England, or becauſe there was betweene them a double bond of affinitie, mention being made of the mightier bond onely: it was neceſſarie to make another, which with expreſſe mention of the perſons, contained all the impediments. The Commander Errera departed from the Emperours Court with the diſpatch of this confederation, a day or two after the Emperor was aduertiſed of the impriſoning of Moron: and being come to the Popes Court the ſixt day of December, and brought into his preſence (after he had made many offers to his Holineſſe, and well informed him of the good will of the Emperour) he deliuered him the capitulations, wherein albeit the articles touching the ſalt, and matters of Benefices in the Realme of Naples, were contrary to that which had bene ſolicited and reſolued vpon with the Viceroy, yet (for that his principall end was to be aſſured of ſuſpitions) he had accepted them, if he had ſeene and knowne that there had bene ſincere proceeding touching the Duchie of Millan. But ſeeing that in the article concerning Francis Sforce, there was no mention made of the imputation made againſt him, nor any promiſe to render vnto him the Eſtate that was taken from him, nor to pardon his faults if he had committed any, but the Emperour in the concluſion made with the Legate, and in the inſtructions giuen to his Agent, had made no ſhew to take any knowledge of ſuch things, their art and ſubtilties were eaſily diſcerned. For the confederation and promiſe made to defend and preſerue Francis Sforce in the Dukedome of Millan, depriued not the Emperour of power to proceed againſt him as againſt his vaſſall, and to declare the freehold to be confisked for that wherewith he was charged, that is, to haue conſpired againſt his Maieſtie: and Monſieur de Bourbon appointed to be Duke in caſe of his death, was alſo to ſucceed in caſe of his priuation, for the lawes do conſider the death natural and the death ciuill, by the which they iudge him to die, who is condemned for ſuch a crime. For this cauſe the Pope anſwered with very graue ſpeeches, that he had no particular matter of diſcord with the Emperor elect, yea touching all differences & contentions that might happen betweene them, he wold neuer chuſe other Iudge then himſelf; but alſo that it was neceſſary to eſtabliſh ſo good an order for the publike affaires, as Italy might remained aſſured, which could not be done vnleſſe he reſtored to Francis Sforce the Duchie of Millan. And he layed afore him reaſons, prouing that ſo generall an article was not ſufficient; concluding that it would be no ſmall griefe to him to be driuen to a neceſſitie to enter into new deliberations, and to eſtrange himſelfe from the Emperour elect, with whom he had alwayes bene moſt firmely conioyned. The Duke of Seſſa replied, that the Emperour had without doubt a ſincere and vpright intention, and that he was content, that notwithſtanding whatſoeuer had happened, the Duchie of Millan ſhould remaine to Francis Sforce, but that by inconſideration that article had not bene ſet downe in more ample forme, and that the Pope ſhould reforme it as he thought good, promiſing to preſent to him within two moneths the ratification, ſo farre forth alſo as he would giue his word not to conclude the League which was negociated with the gouernment of France and the Venetians during that time. It was clearely diſcerned, that this offer had no other foundation then a deſire to gaine the time of two moneths, to the end the Emperour might haue the more leiſure the better to aduiſe himſelf, and to prouide remedies againſt ſo great a League: and yet after many diſputes, and to the great diſcontentment of the Embaſſadours, the Pope conſented to that demand, as well for a deſire to enter as ſlowly as he could into expences and troubles, as for that he ſuppoſed that ſo long as the French King continued priſoner, all contracts and confederations made with the Regent of France would be very dangerous, for that it was in the Emperours power to diſſolue it whenſoeuer he would: and alſo that by this reſpite, it might be (although he had no great hope thereof) that he might obtaine his deſire; which delay if haply it wrought concord betweene the two Kings, he conſidered very wiſely (though many iudged otherwiſe) that it were better to be done in a time when the Emperour ſtood in leaſt neceſſitie, for that by how much his affaires were aduanced or ſtood in good traine, by ſo much the more heauie conditions would he lay vpon the French King, which being ſo ſeuere and rigorous, he ſuppoſed the King would not obſerue them when he was at libertie. There was alſo added to this treatie, that during the ſaid time, there ſhould be no new enterpriſe embraced, nor any action executed againſt the Caſtle of Millan, if Francis Sforce would be bound not to moleſt or offend thoſe without, which condition he would not accept.

1526. The yeare of the natiuitie of the Sonne of God 1525, being paſſed in theſe actions more diſpoſed to warre then to peace, there begun the yeare 1526, which was full of great accidents and wonderfull troubles: in the beginning whereof the Commander Errera returned to the Emperour with letters written with the Popes owne hand, by the which he denied not abſolutely, nor confeſſed the conſpiracies practiſed againſt him, but laying the fault vpon the Marquis of Peſquiero, he laboured to excuſe Francis Sforce, ſeduced (if he had committed any fault) by the counſels of Ierome Moron, and beſought him moſt affectionately, that for the benefite and quiet of all Chriſtendome, it would pleaſe him to pardon him. At which time the Emperour expecting the anſwer of the Pope, held in ſuſpence the practiſes of all others; and albeit he made much of the Duke of Bourbon, promiſing with ſpeed to aduance the accompliſhment of the mariage betwixt his ſiſter and him, yet when Bourbon vrged the finiſhing thereof, and would haue conſummated the mariage, he was alwayes put off till another time, & was told for excuſe, that the Emperour would firſt giue perfection to his owne mariage with the infant of Portugal, who was expected from day to day: but to the end it might be alwayes in the power of the Emperour (notwithſtanding his promiſe to the Duke of Bourbon) to giue her to wife to the French King

King if the accord went on: following herein the custome of Princes, who are led rather by profite, then by honestie. Now after the Emperours mariage was consummated at Seuille in Spaine, the Commander Errera arriued at the Court, with the breuiat of the article concerning Francis Sforce, which article the Pope had deduced at large in his fauour: so that the Emperour being well assured that the Legate Saluiati had no commission to conclude any thing but according to that article, and all his Councell thinking it necessarie to hinder the league that was in hand, and dangerous to haue to do at one time with so great a number of enemies, he saw himselfe reduced to such termes, that he must either content the Pope and the Venetians by restoring Francis Sforce to the Duchie of Millan, or compound with the French King, who in the end, after long arguing and disputation for the countrey of Burgondie, and being out of hope to recouer his libertie by any other meanes, he offered to render it to the Emperour, with all the appertenances and dependances, and to renounce all his rights to the kingdome of Naples and the Duchie of Millan, and to deliuer two of his sonnes in hostage for the assurance of his promises. The disputations were great vpon the election of the one or the other way, and the Viceroy who brought the Most Christian King into Spaine, and had giuen him so many hopes, and so ardently procured his deliuerie, made greater instance then euer to that end, whose authoritie was great with the Emperour, for the reputation he had to loue his profite, and to be faithfull vnto him: but on the contrarie, Mercurie Gattinaro the great Chancellor, a man of base parentage in the countrey of Piedmont, who was of so great credite and experience, that he had managed of long time all the affaires of the Court of most importance, rather exclamed then disputed. These two being entred one day into the Councell, the Emperour being present, to resolue at last all the matters that had bene discoursed so many moneths, the great Chancellor spake thus:

The Emperour maried to the daughter of Portugal.

The Oration of the Chancellor.

I haue alwayes feared (inuincible Emperour) lest our too great couetousnesse, and that we haue proposed vnto our selues immoderate ends, wold be the cause that of so singular and great a victorie, we should reape in the end neither glorie nor profite: but yet I could neuer beleeue, » that the victorie could bring your reputation and estate into danger, as I see now manifestly it » will, since there is question of an accord, by the which all Italy will become desperate, and the » French King set at libertie, but vnder so vnequall conditions, that if not willingly, yet by ne- » cessitie, he will continue a greater enemie to you then before. For my part, I could also wish, and » with as great affection as others, that at one and the same time the Duchie of Burgondie might » be recouered, and ỹ foundations of your imperie in Italy established: but this I know, that who- » soeuer will so suddenly embrace so much, puts himselfe in danger to effect nothing: and that » there is no reason for which it may be said, that the French King being deliuered, will obserue ar- » ticles of so great importance. Knoweth he not, that in rendring Burgondie, he openeth you a way » into France, and that it will be alwayes in your power to runne vp euen to Paris? and that when » you haue the meanes to vexe France in so many places, it will be vnpossible for him to resist you? » Doth not he know, and all the world see, that if he consent that you go to Rome with an ar- » mie, you will become a bridle to all Italy, and dispose at your pleasure of the Estate spi- » rituall and temporall of the Church, and by that meanes your puissance being redoubled, you » shall alwayes after neuer want money nor forces to offend him? and that he shall be constrained » to accept all such lawes as you will impose vpon him? Can any man beleeue then, that he will » obserue an accord, by the which he is made your slaue, and you his Lord? The lamentations » and exclamations of all the Realme of France, will they faile him, together with the perswasions » of the King of England, and the incitations of all Italy? It may be the amitie that is betweene you » two, may cause him to trust you, or willingly to see your great power: but was there euer two » Princes, betweene whom there was greater cause of hatred and contention? There is not onely » betweene you a reciprocall iealousie of greatnesse, a matter apt to stirre vp one brother against » another; but also ancient and great hatreds, begun in the times of your fathers and great » grandfathers, so many and so great warres betweene these two houses, so many peaces and ac- » cords not obserued, so many iniuries and offences done and receiued. May we not beleeue » that he burneth with disdaine, when he remembreth how many moneths he hath bene your pri- » soner? that he hath bene alwayes kept vnder very strait guard, and neuer had so much fauour » shewed him as to see you or speake with you? and that in this prison he hath had so many per- » perplexities and incommodities, as he had almost died therewith? and that now he is not deli- »

" uered through magnanimitie, or any loue that is borne him, but for feare of ſo great a confe" deration conſpired againſt you? Shall we beleeue that an alliance made by neceſſitie, will be " more mightie then ſo many incitations? and who knoweth not, how much Princes eſteeme of
" ſuch bonds? and who can be a better witneſſe then our ſelues, of the eſtimation that is had of " parentages? But to ſome it may haply ſeeme, that we ſhall be greatly aſſured by the faith he will
" giue to returne againe into priſon. But what foundations can be more inconſiderate, and what
" hopes more vnwiſe then theſe? The great griefe which I haue found (inuincible Emperour)
" that there is a diſpoſition to take a courſe ſo hurtfull and dangerous, conſtraines me to ſpeake
" in this ſort. We all know well, what reckoning men make of their faith, when there is queſtion
" of intereſts of Eſtate; and of what force are the promiſes of the French men, who, though free " and open in all other things, yet in this regard are maiſters and moſt perfect in deceiuing; and
" that this King is naturally ſo much the more hard and ſparing in effects, by how much he is plen-" tifull and prodigall in words. Therefore I conclude, that neither the good will betweene two " Princes, who haue for a very ancient inheritance iniuries and offences; nor the memorie of be-
" nefites, which are none; nor faith or promiſes, which in matters of eſtate import litle with ma" ny, but nothing with the French men, will induce him to follow an accord which raiſeth his ene-
" mie to heauen, and throweth himſelfe and his kingdome into manifeſt ſubiection. I know well
" it will be anſwered, that for feare of theſe things, and for better aſſurance, two of his children
" ſhall be demanded, and among others the eldeſt, whoſe loue he will eſteeme more then the price
" of Burgondie: but for my part I am of opinion, that the loue of his children will rather cauſe
" the contrary, when the memorie of them ſhall come to his mind, and the conſideration that to
" obſerue the accord, would be the beginning to make them your ſlaues. I know not whether ſuch
" a pawne would be ſufficient, if he ſhould be altogether deſperate to recouer it in other ſort: for
" that it is a matter of too great importance to put his Realme in danger, which being once
" loſt would hardly be recouered: but he may well hope to redeeme his children in time, either
" by accord, or ſome other occaſion; and in reſpect of their tender age, the expectation will not be
" grieuous vnto him: but when he may haue almoſt all the Princes of Chriſtendome ioyned in " league againſt you, who doubteth but he will confederate with them? and that he will ſeeke to " moderate this accord by the way of warre? and that the gaine and profit which we ſhall reape by
" this victorie, will be nothing elſe but a very ſtrong and dangerous warre, ſtirred vp by the ha" tred, neceſſitie and deſpaire of the French King, the King of England, and all Italy? againſt all
" whom we may defend our ſelues, if God be not wearie with working dayly ſuch miracles for vs
" as he hath ſo often done, euen till this time; and if Fortune for our ſakes change her nature;
" and her inconſtancie and mutabilitie become vnto vs, contrary to all examples paſt, a mirrour
" of conſtancie and ſtabilitie. It is now many moneths ſince we haue concluded in all our coun-
" ſels, to vſe all poſſible meanes to let the Italians for vniting with the houſe of France: and now
" we throw our ſelues raſhly into a deliberation which takes away all difficulties that till this houre
" haue kept them in ſuſpence, which multiplieth our dangers, and increaſeth the forces of our " enemies. For who knoweth not, that that league will be more mightie which ſhall haue for
" chiefe the French King, free and in his owne kingdome, then that which ſhall be made with the " gouernment of France, the King remaining your priſoner? Who knoweth not, that nothing elſe
" hath detained the Pope till this day from entring confederation againſt you, then a feare leſt
" you ſhould ſeparate the French men from them, in offering them their King? But they will haue
" leſſe feare of ſuch a matter, when you ſhal haue ỹ children & not him: and ſo the medicine which
" we would vſe to preuent danger, will be that which without all compariſon will increaſe it,
" and in ſtead of breaking this vnion, we ſhall be the meanes whereby it will become both more
" firme and more puiſſant. But ſome may aske me, What is your aduice then? do you thinke it fit " to make no profite of ſo great a victorie? ſhall we alwayes dwell in theſe doubts and perplexi-
" ties? I confirme that which I haue many times ſpoken, that it is a matter too hurtfull to receiue
" ſo much meate at one time, as the ſtomacke cannot beare: and that it is neceſſarie, either by " returning into amitie with Italy, which demands nothing of vs but to be aſſured, to ſeeke to get
" Burgondie of the French king, and as much elſe as we can: or to make a compoſition with him,
" whereby Italy may remain at our diſcretion, but ſo eaſie in reſpect of his intereſts, ỹ he may haue
" cauſe to obſerue the conditions of it: and in the election of one of theſe two wayes, it is meet
" (moſt mightie Emperor) that your wiſedome & goodnes preferre that which is ſtable and more iuſt,

iuſt, afore that which at the firſt ſhew may haply ſeeme more great and profitable. I confeſſe the Duchie of Millan is an Eſtate more rich and commodious for many regards then Burgondy, and that there can no amitie paſſe with Italy, vnleſſe Millan be transferred either to Francis Sforce or to ſome other to the Popes liking: and yet I rather like this, then to accord with the French men, for that Burgondie appertaineth to you more iuſtly then Millan, and is more eaſie to be maintained, then a countrey where no man deſireth you. To ſeeke to get Burgondie your ancient inheritance, is an action of great praiſe: but to aſpire to Millan, either for your ſelfe, or for any that dependeth wholly vpon you, cannot be without note of ambition. The firſt requireth of you ỹ memory of ſo many of your glorious predeceſſors, whoſe bones lying buried in captiuitie, do crie for nothing elſe, but that you deliuer and recouer them; and their ſo iuſt, ſo deuout, and holy deſires, may haply moue God to be more fauourable vnto you. It is a more diſcreete and eaſie counſell, to ſeeke to eſtabliſh an amitie with him that vnwillingly becomes your enemie, then with one who in no time can be your friend. For in the French king there wil always be a perpetual hate and deſire to oppoſe againſt your doings: but the Pope and the other Italians, once freed of ſuſpition by the reuoking of your armie that is in Lombardie, will haue no occaſion of controuerſie with you, either through iealouſie or feare, and remaining your friends, you ſhall draw from them both now and alwayes, great commoditie and profite. Therefore let honour, profite and ſuretie, make you the more inclined to this amitie, and no leſſe neceſſitie, if I be not deceiued. For, albeit you come to accord with the King, and bind him to no other thing then to aide you in the enterpriſes of Italy, yet me thinkes it is not likely he will obſerue it, for that he will be of opinion, that leauing you Italy in prey, he ſhould put his owne Realme in danger: and on the other ſide, the hopes and oportunities will be very great, that by the meanes of ſo mightie an vnion he ſuppoſeth he hath to trouble you, and to reduce you to accord vnder eaſie conditions: ſo that of a King priſoner, we ſhall make him free and our enemie, and giue a head to the Realme of France, ſo that ioyning with the reſidue, he may raiſe warre againſt vs with greater forces and more profite. How much better were it to confederate with the Italians? to make a good and true alliance with the Pope, who hath continually deſired it? and take from the French all hope to ioyne with the Italians? ſeeing that in that caſe neither neceſſitie nor feare of new leagues, but your owne will and the qualitie of the conditions, will draw you to accord with the French? Then ſhall you ſee that neceſſitie and deſpaire will conſtraine them not onely to deliuer Burgondie into your hands, and to grant you greater things, but alſo to deliuer you ſuch hoſtages, that you ſhall not neede to feare the obſeruation? For to ſpeake the truth, children are not ſufficient, ſo long as they may hope to effect ſo great an vnion: and ſcarcely Bayon, Narbon, and the armie by ſea, would ſuffice if they were put into your hands. Thus may you draw of this victorie a fruite great and honourable, iuſt and ſure: otherwiſe, either I vnderſtand nothing, or by this accord you ſhall embarke your eſtate into ſo great dangers, that I ſee no way to deliuer you therefrom, if haply it happen not that the indiſcretion of the French King become greater then ours. The Chancellor with this accurate and vehement ſpeech, and with the reputation of his wiſedome, had moued the minds of a great part of the Councell, when the Viceroy, principall and author of the contrarie opinion, ſpake, as they ſay, in this ſort:

The Oration of the Viceroy.

Certainly (moſt glorious Emperour) he is not to be praiſed, that by an appetite to haue much, embraceth more then he is able to hold; and he is no leſſe to be blamed, who by too much doubt and diſtruſt, doth willingly depriue himſelfe of great occaſions, gotten with ſo many difficulties and dangers: but both theſe faults being very great, that which proceedeth of feare and abiection of mind, is more to be reprehended and condemned in a great Prince, then that which proceedeth of generoſitie and greatneſſe of courage: and it is more laudable to ſeeke to winne much with danger, then for the auoiding of perill to ſuffer the occaſions to be loſt or interrupted, which very rarely happen to mortall men. Now this is that which indeed the Lord Chancellor doth counſell you, who doubting that by this accord Burgondie and Millan may not be obtained (for we muſt not thinke he is puſhed on either by the loue of Italy which is his countrey, or by the good that he wiſheth to the Duke of Millan) hath reſolued of a way, by the which, as he ſaith, we ſhall get Burgondie and loſe Millan, an Eſtate without compariſon of greater importance. But my opinion is, that we ſhould loſe Millan, and not winne Burgondie, and in ſtead that this victorie hath moſt gloriouſly opened a way to the Imperie of all Chriſtendome,

« dome, there will remaine no other fruite of it, if you follow his counsell, then domage and in« famie. And certainly I cannot discerne any suretie in his counsell, but very great danger, and « verie small profit, and that easie to slide out of our hands, which would be a matter ful of shame
« and indgnitie: but on the contrarie, in compounding with the French King, me thinks there is « great glorie, great profit, & sufficient assurance. For I ask you, my Lord Chancellor, what reason « haue you, what suretie, what faith, that the Italians, after we haue left them the Duchie of Mil-
« lan, will obserue the accord, and not intermeddle in the affaires that shall passe betweene
« the French King and vs? and not rather when they haue embased our reputation, when they haue « caused the armie to be dissolued that doth restraine and bridle their malignitie, and when they « shall be assured that no new companies of Lanceknights can come into Italy, because there is « no place in Lombardie to receiue them, nor where they may lodge; what suretie, I say, haue
« you, that the Italians will not then continue their practises, and will not by threatning the king-
« dome of Naples which will remaine almost at their discretion, force vs to deliuer the French
« King? Do you thinke, my Lord Chancellor, that Francis Sforce will acknowledge the fauours « that haue bene done vnto him? seeing he hath recompenced so many benefites receiued of the « Emperour with such a trecherous part and wicked treason? What will he do now, when he « knoweth there is a purpose to punish so vile an act by the sentence of law? when he feareth pu« nishment, and expecteth his safetie and deliuerance from your enemies? Will you trust the Ve-
« netians, who are naturall enemies to the Empire and the house of Austria? and who tremble
« when they remember that almost yesterday Maximilian your grandfather tooke from them so « many of those townes which they now possesse? Haue you any confidence in the goodnesse of « the Pope, or in his inclination towards the Emperour? with whom the first alliance that Pope
« Leo made, was (after he had attempted many things against vs) for a desire either to be reuen-
« ged, or to be assured against the French men, and for ambition to occupie Ferrara? and after him
« the Pope now reigning who was hated of the one moitie of the world, continued by necessitie
« (after the death of Leo) in your amitie; but when he was become Pope, he returned immediatly
« to the nature of Popes, which is to feare and hate the Emperours, so that he had nothing more
« in horror then the name of the Emperour. All this haply may be excused, & it may be answered, « that their cõplots and enterprises proceeded not of hatred or ambition, but only of the iealousie
« of your greatnesse, the which being ceassed, all practises will take end. But either this is not « true, or if at the beginning it was true, it must of necessitie haue taken other rootes, and be« come another humor, for that it is a thing naturall, that hatred followeth suspition, and offences
« and vexations come after hatred, and after offences men draw to alliance and amitie with the e« nemies of him whom they haue offended, labouring to raise practises, not onely for their proper « suretie, but also to make their profit of the ruine of him whom they haue offended: and further,
« the remembrance of wrongs is far greater and more stirring in the mind of him that doth them, « then in him that receiueth them. Wherefore although at the first they were moued onely with « suspition, the same was the cause that moued them to become your enemies, & incited them to « turne as wel their minds as their hopes to the French part, and afterwards to begin to deuide a« mong themselues the Realme of Naples, as they haue done in all contracts past: now let vs giue « them what suretie, and make what accord you will with them, hatred and feare will still burne in « their breasts; not trusting to that which seemeth to them to be done by necessitie; and « supposing they haue no more meanes to range you to their wils, fearing lest in the « end there be made betweene the French King and vs a new appointment, semblable to that « which was made at Cambray, and desiring (to vse their owne words) to deliuer Italy of strangers;
« they will presume to giue you lawes, and to demand of you the deliuerie of the French King;
« the which if you refuse (most noble Emperour) how can you defend against them the king-
« dome of Naples? and if you grant it them, you lose all the fruits of the victorie, and remaine
« the most dishonored and despised Prince that euer was. But let vs put the case that Italy will ob-« serue the accord, and that necessitie constraine you either to leaue Millan or not to reco« uer Burgondie, what comparison is there betweene these two? Burgondie is a countrey of litle « circuite, of small reuenue, and not so commodious as many perswade themselues. The Duchie
« of Millan, both for the riches and beautie of so many Cities, for the number and nobleness of « the subiects, for the great reuenues, and for that it is sufficient to nourish all the armies of the « world, is more to be esteemed then many kingdomes; and besides the amplitude and puissance

of it, there is more reckoning to be made of the commodities that may reuert to you by the conqueſt thereof, then of the value of the thing it ſelfe. For Millan and Naples being at your deuotion, it will follow by neceſſitie that the Popes, as anciently they were wont, muſt depend vpon the Emperours: That all Tuſcane, the Duke of Ferrara, and the Marquis of Mantua, ſhall be your ſubiects: and the Venetians being enuironed by Lombardie and Germanie, will be conſtrained to accept lawes at your hand: and thus, I ſay, not with force and armes diſplayed, but with the reputation of your name, with one onely Herald, with the enſignes of the Empire, you ſhall command all Italy. And who knoweth not what Italy is? A Prouince by good right eſteemed the Queene of all others, for the oportunitie of her ſituation, for the temperature of the aire and Climate, for the multitude & excellencie of wits moſt apt for all honorable enterpriſes, for the fertilitie of all things neceſſarie to the life of man, for the greatneſſe and beautie of ſo many noble Cities, for her riches, for the ſeate of Religion, for the ancient glorie of the Empire, and for infinite other regards, the which if you command, you ſhal be always redoubted of all other Princes. It belongeth more to your greatneſſe and glorie, to looke after this, and is more agreeable to the bones of your elders (ſith theſe alſo are brought into conſideration) who both for their goodneſſe and pietie, we are not to beleeue do deſire any other thing then what is moſt conuenient, and moſt glorious for your name. So that, by following the counſell of the Lord Chancellor, we ſhall loſe a very great matter for a thing righe ſmall, that hitle alſo being very vncertaine, as we may well know by that which was like to haue happened certaine moneths paſt. Do we not remember how much we were troubled when the French King lay in ſo great danger of death? and that the ſame proceeded of no other thing then of the knowledge, that by his death we ſhould loſe all the fruite hoped for by the victorie? And who can aſſure vs that the verie ſame may not now happen? but more eaſily, for as much as the relikes of his maladie do yet hang vpon him, and for that the hope which till now hath ſupported him, being taken away, greater diſcontentments, the onely cauſe of his ſickneſſe, will returne vpon him: eſpecially ſeeing (by reaſon there is debating of new conditions and aſſurances, which cannot eaſily be agreed vnto) the negociation of new practiſes will be long and tedious, which will be ſubiect to this accident, and haply to others more great and more dangerous. Do we not well know, that nothing hath ſo long retained the Gouernment and Counſel of France, as the opinion they haue of his ſpeedie deliuerie? by meanes whereof the Nobles and Chieftaines of that Realme haue remained peaceable and obedient to the Ladie Regent: but aſſoone as they ſhall find this hope to faile, it may eaſily happen thereby that the Realme being moued therewith, will alter the gouerment: That if the great ones of the kingdome get once the bridle in their hand, they will take no care for the deliuerie of their King, but to maintaine themſelues in libertie and to be maiſters, they will be glad of his captiuitie, and ſo in ſtead of getting Burgondie and ſo many other great things, we can no more hope for any thing by his deliuerie. But I aske you further, my Lord Chancellor, whether the Emperour in this reſolution ought to haue any regard to his dignitie and Maieſtie? and what greater infamie he can receiue, and what greater diminution of his honour, then to be conſtrained to pardon Francis Sforce? and that a man halfe dead, a rebell, and ſingular example of ingratitude, not in humbling himſelfe, and imploring your mercie, but caſting himſelfe into the armes of your enemies, ſhould force you to yeeld vp & render vnto him the Eſtate which ſo iuſtly hath beene taken from him, and to receiue lawes of him? It were better (moſt inuincible Emperour) and more agreeable to the dignitie of the Empire and your greatneſſe, to expoſe your ſelfe againe to fortune, & to put all things again in danger, then forgetting the degree which you hold, and hauing no regard to the authoritie of the ſoueraigne Prince ouer all Princes, & to the name of the Emperor, hauing ſo often vanquiſhed ſo mightie a King, to accept & receiue at the hands of Priſts and Merchants, ſuch conditions, as if you had beene ouerthrowne, there could not haue beene offered to you either more vniuſt or more vnworthy. Therefore all theſe reaſons conſidered, and how ſmall the profit wil be which may come to you by the accord with the Italians, and by how many accidents it may eaſily ſlip out of your hands; how vnſure it is to truſt them, and how vnworthy a thing it is to leaue the Eſtate of Millan, and all that it is neceſſarie to reſolue our ſelues, and once to conſider the end, and that the imprioonment of the King profiteth vs not, but in regard of the fruites that may be drawne of his deliuerie: Haue counſelled, and do counſell againe, that we compound rather with the King then with the Italians, which is a matter

ter that cannot be denied to be more glorious, more reasonable, and more profitable, so farre forth as we may be assured of the obseruation, wherein I make some foundation, both of his thankefulnesse for the benefite he shall receiue of you, of the bond of affinitie, and of the vertue of your sister, a fit instrument to maintaine this amitie; but much more of his two sons, and among these of the eldest, which is such a pawne, as I know not whether any more great or more important can be receiued. And seeing our necessity driueth vs to determine something, we ought rather repose confidence in a French king vnder such hostages, then in the Italians without any gage: and rather to trust the word and faith of so great a King, then the immoderate couetousnes of Priests, and the suspitious niggardlinesse of Merchants: and with more facilitie may we haue amitie for a time with the French (as our elders haue often had) then with the Italians our naturall and perpetuall enemies. And in this way I do not onely discerne greater hope that faith will be kept with vs, but also lesse danger in case of promise breaking. For if the King refuse to render vs Burgondie, at least he will not dare (his children remaining hostages) to offend you againe, but will labour by solicitation and suite to moderate the accord: and besides, being as it were but yesterday vanquished by you, and newly come out of prison, he will stand in feare of you, and will not haue the courage to make a new proofe of your fortune. And if he take not armes against you, it is certaine that all others will be quiet enough: so that you may conquer the Castle of Millan, and so establish your selfe in that Estate, that hereafter you shall not need to feare the malice of any man. But if you accord now with the Italians, and they will breake their promise, there remaineth no bridle to restraine them: and their power increasing to offend you, their desire will likewise augment and be more free therein. Therefore in my iudgement it would be verie great both timorousnesse and imprudencie, for too great suspition, to lose an accord so full of glorie, and so honorable, and wherein there is sufficient suretie, to take in place thereof a resolution (if I be not deceiued) very dangerous and domageable.

When the Viceroy had spoken, the opinions of the residue of the Councell were diuerse: all such as were of vpright iudgement supposing that to accord with the French King according to the maner propounded, would be a deliberation very dangerous: and yet the desire to get Burgondie was so great in the Flemings, as being the ancient patrimonie and title of their Princes, that it suffered them not to discerne the truth: and likewise the bruite went, that the gifts and great promises made by the French men, wrought much with many: but the Emperour aboue all the residue (either for that such was his first inclination, or for that the authoritie of the Viceroy could do much with him, chiefly hauing the Count Nassau concurrant with him, or haply, because he held it too great an indignitie to be constrained to pardon Francis Sforce,) hearkened willingly to such as counselled him to compound with the French King: so that when he had caused the Legate Saluiati to be sounded againe, to know if he would consent that the Estate of Millan should be giuen to the Duke of Bourbon, and that he was certified that the Legate had no commission to accept of that condition (in which case he would haue preferred the amitie of the Pope,) he determined to accord with the French king, with whom (matters hauing bene alreadie debated, and in a maner concluded) he came to conclusion in a very few days, the Popes Legate not medling with any thing: & the Emperor had alreadie obtained the consent of the Duke of Bourbon to giue in mariage to the French King his sister, whom he had promised to him, whereunto he consented after he had bene much intreated, not so much for the desire he had to get the Duchie of Millan, which was promised to him against the will of the great Chancellour and the Viceroy, although with condition to be bound to pay a great summe of money, as for that his affaires being reduced to such termes that they neither depended nor could depend vpon any other then the Emperour, he was constrained to accommodate himself to his will; and as soone as he had giuen his consent, he departed forthwith by the Emperours direction, to the end not to be present at the Court at so inconuenient a time, taking his way towards Barselonia, whither necessarie prouisions to passe into Italy were to be sent vnto him the which for want of vessels (for at that time there were but three galleys in Spaine) and for lacke of money, stayed verie long.

The treatie of Madril touching the deliuerie of the French king.

The solicitation of the peace which was resolued the fourteenth day of February in the yeare 1526. contained: That betweene the Emperour and the French King should be a peace perpetuall, in the which should be comprehended all such as should be named by their common consent:

ſent: That the French King by the ſixt day of the next moneth of March, ſhould be ſet at libertie, vpon the marches in the coaſt of Fontarabie; and that within ſixe weekes after he ſhould conſigne to the Emperour the Duchie of Burgondie, the Countie of Charrolois, the iuriſdiction of Noyers, the Caſtle Chinon dependances of the ſaid Duchie, the Viſcountie of Auſſone, the iuriſdiction of S. Laurence de la Roche a dependant of Franch Countie, together with all the appertenances as well of the ſaid Duchie as Countie of Burgondie, which hereafter ſhould be ſeparate and exempted from the ſoueraigntie of the Realme of France: That at the very houre and inſtant that the King ſhould be deliuered, there ſhould be put into the Emperours hands the Daulphin of France, and with him either the Duke of Orleans the Kings ſecond ſon, or twelue of the principall Lords of France, whom the Emperour ſhould name, leauing it in the election of the Ladie Regent, either to deliuer the Kings ſecond ſonne or the twelue Barons, who ſhould remaine as hoſtages vntill reſtitution were made of the lands and places aforeſaid, and the peace ſworne and ratified, together with all the articles, by the general Eſtates of France, and enregiſtred (which they call abſolute approbation) in all the Courts of Parliament of that kingdome, with neceſſarie ſolemnities: for the performance whereof, there was ſet downe a terme of foure moneths; at which time returning the hoſtages, there ſhould be put into the Emperours hands, the Duke of Angouleſme the Kings third ſonne, to the end he might be trained vp with the Emperour, the better to entertaine and aſſure the peace: That the French King ſhould renounce and giue vp to the Emperour all his rights to the Realme of Naples, and chiefly thoſe which were to come to him by the inueſtiture of the Church: and that he ſhould do the like touching his intereſts in the Eſtates of Millan, Genes, Aſt, and likewiſe of Arras, Tourney, de l'Iſle, and of Doway: That he ſhould render vp alſo the Towne and Caſtle of Hedin as a member of the Countie of Artois, with all the munitions, artilleries, and moueables that were in it when it was laſt taken: That he ſhould renounce the ſoueraigntie of Flanders and Artois, and all other places which the Emperour poſſeſſed. And on the other ſide, that the Emperour ſhould reſigne to him all the title and quarell which he pretended to any place poſſeſſed by the French men, and ſpecially the townes and Caſtlewikes of Peronne, Mondidier, Roye, the Counties of Bulleine and Poitiers, with other townes ſtanding vpon the ſhores of the riuer of Somme: That there ſhould be betweene them a league and confederation perpetuall for the defence of their Eſtates, with obligation to aide one another when need required, with fiue hundred men at armes and ten thouſand footmen: That the Emperour ſhould promiſe to giue in mariage to the Moſt Chriſtian King the Ladie Eleoner his ſiſter, whom as ſoone as the diſpenſation ſhould be obtained from the Pope he ſhould contract, with words binding for the preſent, and afterwards ſhe ſhould be led into France to conſummate the mariage at the ſame time that according to the capitulations the hoſtages were to be deliuered: That ſhe ſhould haue for her portion two hundred thouſand crownes, with Iewels according to her eſtate, the one moitie of the money to be payed within ſixteene moneths, and the other halfe one yeare after: That a mariage ſhould be made betweene the Daulphin and the daughter of the King of Portugal, daughter to the Ladie Eleoner, as ſoone as their age would ſuffer: That the French King ſhould do all that he could to induce the ancient King of Nauarre to giue vp to the Emperour the rights of that kingdome; and in caſe he would not do it, that the King ſhould giue him no ſuccours: That the King ſhould likewiſe cauſe the Duke of Gueldres and the Count of Zutphen, and the principall townes of their eſtates, to promiſe with ſufficient ſecuritie, to giue themſelues to the Emperour, after their death: That the King ſhould giue no ſuccours to the Duke of Wittenberg, nor likewiſe to Robert de la March: That he ſhould furniſh and rigge for the Emperour, when he ſhould paſſe into Italy, and two moneths after he ſhall be ſo required, twelue galleys, foure ſhips, and foure gallions, all well munitioned and appointed at his owne coſt, except the men of warre; and that the ſaid veſſels ſhould be rendred three moneths after, accounting from the day of his embarking: That in ſtead of the armie by land which the King offered for Italy, he ſhould pay two hundred thouſand crownes in money, the one halfe within ſixteene moneths, and the other halfe within a yeare after: And that at the time when the hoſtages ſhould be deliuered, he ſhould be bound to giue bils of exchange for the pay of ſixe thouſand footmen for ſixe moneths immediatly after the Emperours arriuall in Italy: That he ſhould alſo furniſh for his ſeruice fiue hundred Lances payed, with a band of artillerie: That he ſhould ſaue harmeleſſe the Emperour of his promiſe made to the King of England for the pensions which the French King owed him, the arrerages whereof amounted to fiue hundred thousand crownes, or else to deliuer so much readie money to the Emperour: That they should both ioyne to intreate the Pope to call a generall Councell as soone as possibly might be, to the end to consult of peace among Christians, of an enterprise against the Infidels and heretickes, and to grant to all men the Croisado for three yeares: That within sixe weekes the King should restore the Duke of Bourbon in most ample forme, into all his Estates & goods, moueable and vnmoueable, with the fruits and reuenues receiued: and that he should not molest him for any thing past, nor constraine him to dwell or go to the Realme of France: and that it should be lawfull to the said Duke of Bourbon to demand by the way of iustice, the Earledome of Prouence: That in like sort all those that had followed him should reenter in safetie into their goods and estates, and namely the Bishop of Autun and Monsieur de Saint Valier: That the prisoners taken in the warre should be deliuered on both parts within fifteene dayes: That there should be restitution made to the Ladie Margaret of Austria of all that she possessed afore the warre: That the Prince of Orange should be set at libertie, with restauration to the Principalitie of Orange, and all that he possessed by the death of his father, which had bene taken from him for following the faction of the Emperour: and that the like should be done to some other Barons: That the Marquis of Saluſſa should haue his Estate restored vnto him: That the King, as soone as he arriued in the first towne of his Realme, should ratifie this capitulation, and be bound to procure the Daulphin to ratifie it when he should come to the age of foureteene yeares. Many were named by common consent, and among them the Swissers: but not one of the Potentates of Baly, except the Pope, whom they named as conseruator of this accord, and that more for manners sake and ceremonie, then in effect and true meaning. Lastly, it was expressed in the said capitulation, that in case the King for any occasion should not accomplish the things promised, he should returne voluntarily into prison. All Christendome maruelled much at this accord. For when it was vnderstood that the first execution thereof consisted in the deliuerie of the King, the vniuersall opinion was, that being deliuered, he would not giue vp Burgondie, as being a member of too great importance for the Realme of France: and besides those few who had counselled the Emperour to it, all his Court had the same iudgement, and aboue all the great Chancellor reproued and detested the matter with so great vehemencie, that notwithstanding he was commanded to signe the capitulation according to the office of chiefe Chancellor, he refused to do it, alledging that in matters dangerous and hurtfull, as that was, he ought not to vse the authoritie that was giuen him: neither could he euer be altered from this opinion, notwithstanding the Emperour was angrie with him: who seeing him so resolute in his opinion, signed it himselfe, and within few dayes after went to Madril to confirme the alliance and make a foundation of amitie and good-will with the King, by entertaining him with familiar and priuate conference. Great were the ceremonies and demonstrations of amitie betweene them: oftentimes they shewed themselues together in publike places; they had oftentimes alone in secret very long discourses: they went together in one coach to a Castle halfe a dayes iourney from thence, where was Queene Eleoner whom the King contracted: and yet notwithstanding all these great signes of peace and amitie, he was no lesse straitly guarded then before, without hauing any more libertie: so that at one and the same time he was embraced as a brother and guarded as a prisoner; which made manifest to the world, that it was an accord full of discord, an alliance without amitie, and that vpon euery occasion their ancient iealousies and passions would be stronger in them then the regard of things done more by force then otherwise. Now when many dayes were spent in these actions, and that the ratification of the Ladie Regent was come, together with the declaration, that with the Daulphin of France they would rather giue in hostage the Kings second sonne then the twelue Barons, the King departed from Madril to go to the frontier of his Realme, where his person was to be exchanged for his sonnes, who were verie yong: and there was sent to accompanie him the Viceroy the author of his deliuerie, to whom the Emperour had giuen the Citie of Ast and other Estates in Flanders and in the kingdome of Naples.

The French king contracteth the Emperours sister.

At this time the Emperour wrote to the Pope a letter of Court, wherein he certified him, that for the desire of peace, and the common good of Christendome, so many iniuries and enmities forgotten, he had restored the French King to libertie, and had giuen him his sister in mariage,

The Emperour writeth to the Pope touching the French kings deliuery.

mariage, and that he had choſen him for the preſeruer of peace, and would alwayes continue his moſt obedient ſon: and not many dayes after he wrote to him another letter of his owne hand, which he ſent by the ſame Commander Errera, who had brought with him the letter written vnto him with the Popes owne hand, anſwering it partly with gracious and partly with rigorous words, concluding, that if Francis Sforce were not found guiltie of that whereof he was accuſed, he would reſtore to him the Duchie of Millan; and that he would haue the matter tried by the courſe of iuſtice, by ſuch Iudges as ſhould be deputed by himſelfe, as his ſuperiour: but in caſe it were found that he were guiltie, he could do no leſſe then inueſt in that Eſtate the Duke of Bourbon, to whom himſelfe was the cauſe that he had promiſed it, aduiſing him thereunto whileſt Francis Sforce lay ſicke; and as well to ſatisfie him, as to aſſure all Italy, he purpoſed not either to retaine that Dukedome for himſelfe, or to giue it to his owne brother, affirming vpon his faith, that ſuch was his ſimple intention, the which he earneſtly deſired him to approue, offering him alwayes his authoritie and forces, as an obedient ſonne to the Sea Apoſtolike. The ſame Errera alſo brought the anſwer to the draught of the article which had bene ſet downe at large by the Pope in fauour of Francis Sforce, which article the Emperour continuing in his firſt reſolution, would not allow: but ſent by the ſaid Errera to the Duke of Seſſa the forme of the accord as he was determined finally to paſſe it, with authoritie and power to contract if the Pope would accept it. The contents whereof were: That Francis Sforce ſhould be comprehended in the confederation, ſo farre forth as he were not found guiltie in the crime of treaſon: but in caſe of his death or depriuation, the Duke of Bourbon ſhould ſucceed in the confederation, and receiue of him the inueſtiture of the Duchie of Millan: The obligation was confirmed which the Viceroy had made for the reſtitution of the townes holden by the Duke of Ferrara, but with condition that the Pope ſhould be bound to paſſe to him the inueſtiture of Ferrara, and forgiue him the penaltie of contrauention; matters contrary to the Popes drifts, who had determined to exact a paine of an hundred thouſand duckats, to pay the hundred thouſand which he had promiſed to the Emperour in caſe of that reſtitution: He would not admit that the eſtate of Millan ſhould take Salt of the Church, nor referre himſelfe touching the collation of benefices in the Realme of Naples to the tenour of the inueſtitures, but to the cuſtome of the former Kings, who in many caſes had contemned the rights and authoritie of the Sea Apoſtolike. And becauſe a treatie had bene made with the Legate, that to remoue the armie out of Lombardie which was a great charge to all Italy, the Pope, and he as King of Naples, and the other Potentates of Italy, ſhould pay an hundred and fiftie thouſand duckats, and the ſaid armie to retire into Naples, or into ſome ſuch place out of Italy as ſhould ſeeme good to the Emperour, who ſaid he would tranſport it into Barbarie: and it was added, that becauſe there was more due to the armie then was owing them at that time, there ſhould be leuied a pay of two hundred thouſand duckats. A copie of theſe articles was preſented to the Pope by the Duke of Seſſa and the Commander Errera, with proteſtation that it was not in their power to alter or change one ſyllable: and yet all other difficulties had eaſily taken forme, if the Duchie of Millan had bene ſo diſpoſed of as the Pope with the reſidue had had no cauſe to enter into ſuſpition. But they conſidered that the Duke of Bourbon was ſo implacable an enemie to the French King, that either for his ſuretie, or for a deſire to enter into France, he would be alwayes very ſubiect to the Emperour, and that it could neuer be hoped that he would be diſcontented with his exceſſiue greatneſſe: and that the article to remoue the armie out of Lombardie, a matter ſo greatly deſired of all, and for which they would not haue thought ſtrange to haue giuen any ſumme of money, would be to litle purpoſe, ſo long as there remained at Millan a Duke, who euen at the leaſt becke of the Emperour, would not onely admit him, but haply for his owne intereſt would wiſh and deſire him. Therefore the Pope, who (for that in the accord which the Emperour had made with the French King, there was no particular mention of him, nor of the ſuretie of the Eſtates of Italy) was confirmed in his former opinion, that the greatneſſe of the Emperour would be his ſeruitude, determined not to accept the accord in the maner it was offered him, but to keepe himſelfe free vntill he were aſſured what courſe the French would take touching the obſeruation of the peace: in which reſolution he remained the more willingly, for as much as beſides that which ſeemed likely vnto him, he had heard by the relation of certaine ſpeeches deliuered by the King afore his libertie, and ſpread abroad by ſome that were familiar in counſell with him, that the King would neuer obſerue the things he had promiſed the Emperour: and to confirme the King in that deliberation (for his owne ſuretie depended thereupon) he ſent in poſt into France, Paul Vettori a Florentine, Captaine of his Galleys, to the end to be at the Court at the ſame time the King ſhould arriue, vſing that diligence not onely to know his intention as ſoone as might be, but alſo to the end that the King hauing a readie hope to be able to draw into league the Pope and the Venetians againſt the Emperour, might take occaſion to reſolue the ſooner. Therfore Paul had in charge, to congratulate in the Popes name the Kings deliuerie, and to declare vnto him what he had done to that end, and how much the practiſes of confederation that were entertained with the Ladie Regent, had induced the Emperour to deliuer him: and further, that he ſhould impart vnto him the Popes vehement deſire to haue an vniuerſall peace in Chriſtendome, and that the Emperour and he ſhould make warre together againſt the Turke, who was reported to make mightie preparations to inuade that yeare the Realme of Hungarie. Theſe were his Commiſſions apparent and knowne; but the moſt important and ſecret was, that aboue all things he ſhould endeuour dexterouſly to ſound throughly the Kings inclination, and if he found him enclined to obſerue the treatie of Madril, then to paſſe no further, for feare of making his affaires with the Emperour worſe then before; but if he found him otherwiſe diſpoſed, or at leaſt in doubt, that he ſhould labour to confirme him in that diſpoſition; and ſeruing his turne of all occaſions, he ſhould counſell him to take that courſe, giuing him knowledge of the Popes deſire to ioyne with him for the common benefite. He diſpatched in like ſort into England the Pronotarie Gambaro, to vſe the like office with that King, to the ſame end: and at his perſwaſion the Venetians ſent into France their Secretarie Andrew Roſſe, with the like commiſſions; and for as much as Paul as ſoone as he came to Florence fell ſicke and died, the Pope ſent in his place Capin of Mantua, although he tooke it for an ill ſigne, that now the ſecond time the miniſters which he had ſent into France to aduance theſe practiſes, were dead by the way. In the meane while both he and the Venetians did all they could to encourage the Duke of Millan, and entertained him with hopes, leſt the peace of Madril might cauſe him vnaduiſedly to make ſome accord with the Emperour.

The maner of the deliuerie of the French King.

By this time the French King was come to Fontaraby, a towne appertaining to the Emperor, ſtanding neare the Ocean ſea, vpon the frontiers of Biſcay and the Duchie of Guyen: and on the other ſide, the Ladie Regent was arriued with the children of France at Bayon, which is not farre from Fontaraby: and ſhe had lingred ſome time longer then the day appointed for the permutation, by reaſon the gout tooke her by the way. Then the eighteenth day of March, the French King accompanied with the Viceroy and Captaine Alarcon, with fiftie horſe, came to the ſhore of the riuer that deuideth the Realme of France from the kingdome of Spaine: at the ſame time Monſieur de Lautrech with the Kings children and the like number of horſe preſenting themſelues on the other ſide. There was in the midſt of the riuer a great barke made faſt with ankers, in which was no perſon. The King approched to this barke in a litle boate, wherein he was accompanied with the Viceroy, Captaine Alarcon, and eight others, all armed with ſhort weapons: and on the other ſide of the Barke were likewiſe brought in a litle boate Monſieur de Lautrech with the hoſtages, and eight others armed in the ſame maner. After this the Viceroy went into the Barke with all his companie, and the King with them: and preſently after Monſieur de Lautrech with his eight that accompanied him, ſo that within the Barke there was a like number of both parts, Alarcon and his eight being with the Viceroy, and Monſieur de Lautrech and the others with the perſon of the King: who when they were all thus within the Barke, Monſieur de Lautrech fetched out of the boate into the Barke, the Daulphin, who being giuen to the Viceroy, and by him committed to Captaine Alarcon, was forthwith beſtowed in their boate, and after him followed the litle Duke of Orleans, who was no ſooner entred the Barke, then the French King leaped out of the Barke into his boate, with ſuch ſwiftneſſe, that this permutation was thought to be done at one ſelfe inſtant: and then the King being brought to the ſhore, mounted ſuddenly (as though he had feared ſome ambuſh) vpon a Turkiſh horſe of a wonderfull ſwiftneſſe, which was prepared for the purpoſe, and ranne without ſtay to Saint Iohn de Lus, a towne of his obedience foure leagues from thence; and being there readily relieued with a freſh horſe, he ranne with the ſame ſwiftneſſe to Bayon, where he was receiued with incredible ioy of all the Court, from whence he diſpatched with great diligence a Gentleman to the King of England, with letters of his owne hand, whereby he ſignified in what ſort he was deliuered, and

with

with charge to tell him, that he acknowledged the effect of his libertie to be wrought wholly by him, offering to remaine to him a perpetuall and assured friend, and to be guided in all his affaires by his counsell: and soone after he sent vnto him other Embassadours, solemnely to ratifie the peace which his mother had made with him when he was prisoner: for that he made great account of the amitie of that King.

THE XVII. BOOKE OF THE historie and discourse of Guicciardin.

THE ARGVMENT.

THe Pope and the French king, the Venetians and the Duke of Millan, draw into league against the Emperour. The Duke of Bourbon comes to Millan. The armie of the League breakes vp from before Millan. The Castle of Millan rendred to the Imperials. Many enterprises are dressed against the Pope. The Confederates send their armies by sea to Genes. Rome is surprised by the Colonnois. The Pope makes truce with the Imperials, which hurteth the deuices of Lombardy. The Duke of Ferrara confederates with the Emperour.

NOtwithstanding the pledges of the two children of France (of whom the eldest being heire apparent to so great a succession, was one) was added to the oath and faith that passed betweene the Emperour and the French King, for the confirmation of the accord solemnely made at Madril, and withall the King had contracted the Emperours sister: yet by his deliuerie all the Princes of Christendome were brought into no small expectation, and the eyes of all men which before were fixed onely vpon the Emperour, began now to be turned towards the King, for that sundry and great effects depended vpon his deliberation either to obserue or not to obserue the capitulations of Madril. For if he obserued them, they saw that Italy, vnable to defend it selfe, would fall, without any remedie, into seruitude; and that the authoritie and greatnesse of the Emperour would be maruellously increased: and if he obserued them not, the Emperour would be constrained by the inobseruancie of the French King to forget the conspiracies and enterprises dressed against him by the Duke of Millan, and to restore him to that Duchie, to the end the Pope and the Venetians might not haue cause to ioyne with the King; and that by this meanes he should lose the great profits he hoped to reape by his victorie: or else (his indignation against the Duke of Millan being more powerfull in him, together with his desires to haue no impediment of the French in Italy) to assure the accord made with the King, conuerting the obligation to restore Burgondie into the paiment of money: or else yeelding to neither of these, to haue against so many enemies a warre, which (almost by his owne confession) was very difficult; since to auoid it, he was reduced to this strait, to deliuer the French King with so great danger. But the world stood not long in doubt of the will & intention of the French king: for that as soone as he was arriued at Bayon, being required by a Gentleman of the Viceroys to ratifie the accord, as he had promised to do as soone as he was come into a free place, he deferred it from day to day with many excuses: wherewith to the end to hold the Emperour in hope, he sent vnto him a man expresse, to signifie vnto him, that he had not presently accomplished the ratification, for that it was necessarie before he proceeded to such an act, to reappease and moderate the minds of his subiects, who were discontented with obligations that tended to the diminution of the Crowne of France: but notwithstanding all difficulties, he would vndoubtedly obserue all that he had promised. By this dealing, his in-

not without ſome ſuſpition of ſymonie practiſed with the Cardinall Colonno: or elſe leſt the great ſeueritie he had vſed againſt his countrey, with ſo many tumults of warre, ſhould make him perpetually infamous to the Councell, the rather for that it appeared by the effects, that he had bene moued, not as he publiſhed in the beginning, to reduce it to a good and moderate gouernment, but with ambition, and a deſire to bring it againe vnder the ſeruitude of his houſe: and for theſe cauſes abhorring the Councell, and not accounting the fidelitie of the Emperour a ſufficient ſuretie, when he had communicated the whole matter to the Cardinals deputed to the diſcuſſion of this matter, who alſo feared to be corrected by the Councell: he anſwered that there were many reaſons for the which it was not yet time to ſpeake thereof, for as much as peace was not yet wel eſtabliſhed among the Princes of Chriſtendome, and it was feared leſt the Turke would ſtirre againe, in which caſe it were not good that he ſhould find Chriſtendome encombred with the diſputations and contentions of a Councell: and yet making ſhew that he would referre it to the reſolution of the Emperour, he concluded, that he was contented that he ſhould promiſe in the Diot the indiction of a Councell, ſo that it might be celebrated in Italy, and in his preſence, due time being aſſigned for the aſſembling thereof: and that the Lutherans and other heretikes promiſing to ſtand to the determination of the Councell, ſhould in the meane while deſiſt from their corruptions, and rendring to the Sea Apoſtolike their due obedience, ſhould returne to their former maner of liuing like Chriſtian Catholikes: whereby all the matter was made more difficult. For the Lutherans not onely would not deſiſt from their opinions and ceremonies before the celebration of the Councell: and alſo it was beleeued, that they abhorred the Councell, for that they could expect no other thing thereof, then a reprobation of their opinions, ſeeing the moſt part and the principall of them had bene many times condemned as hereticall by ancient Councels; but that they inſiſted vpon the conuocation thereof, for that knowing it was a matter fearefull to the Popes, they perſwaded themſelues it would not be granted, and by that meanes they might ſupport their cauſe among the people with the greater authoritie.

1531. The yeare 1530 ended with theſe agitations, and the yeare 1531 ſucceeded, wherein was ſmall cauſe of troubles. For notwithſtanding it was comprehended by many ſignes that the French king was ill contented with the accords made with the Emperour, and very deſirous of new tumults, and that the King of England alſo had the ſame inclination, being angry with the Emperour, for that defending the ſiſter of his mother he impugned the matter of diuorce: neuertheleſſe the French King being both bare of money, and not well repoſed after the trauels of ſo long warres, the time was not yet fit to raiſe new troubles. But in the meane while he was diligent to practiſe as well in Germanie with ſuch Princes as bare minds eſtranged from the Emperour, as in Italy with the Pope, to whom, the better to aſſure his amitie, he made an ouerture of mariage betweene his ſecond ſonne and the Popes Neece: and (which he practiſed to the great offence of God, and with an horrible infamie to the Crowne of France, which had alwayes made principall profeſſion to defend Chriſtian Religion, for which merits it had gotten the title of Moſt Chriſtian) he held practiſes with the Prince of Turkes, to ſtirre him vp againſt the Emperour, towards whom the Turke was ordinarily ill diſpoſed, as well for his naturall hatred againſt the Chriſtian name, as for the controuerſies he had with his brother, tending to queſtions for the Realme of Hungarie with the Vayuod, of whom he had taken the protection: as alſo for that the greatneſſe of the Emperour began likewiſe to be ſuſpected of him. At this time the Imperiall Captaines leuied their forces from the territories of Sienna, to leade them to Piemont, when, to ſatisfie the Pope, they had reeſtabliſhed in Sienna the family of Montenouo, to enioy their countrey and goods, but not to alter the forme of gouernment: and when for their ſuretie they had left a guard of three hundred Spaniſh footmen depending vpon the Duke of Malfi, vnder whom (for that he could not keepe his authoritie) things returned forthwith into the ſame diſorders, ſo that ſuch as had bene reſtored, departed away for feare. Alſo the Emperour pronounced the forme of gouernment for Florence, diſſembling that part of the authoritie giuen him which limited the ſauing of their libertie: for that according to the very inſtructions which the Pope had ſent vnto him, he decreed that the citie ſhould be gouerned with the ſame Magiſtrates and in the ſame maner it was wont to be in the times when the Medices ruled it: and that Alexander the Popes nephew and his ſonne in law, ſhould be chiefe in the gouernment: and that in caſe of his death, the children and next deſcendants of the ſame family

mily ſhould ſucceed from hand to hand. He reſtored to the Citie all the priuiledges agreed vnto before times by him and his predeceſſors, but with this condition annexed, to loſe them as often as the Citie ſhould attempt any thing againſt the greatneſſe of the family of Medicis; inſerting through all the Decree, words which ſhewed that he tooke not his ground onely vpon the power that had bene giuen to him by the parties, but alſo vpon the authoritie and dignitie Imperiall. But hauing herein haply more ſatisfied the Pope then the faculties giuen him by the compromiſe, he offended him as much immediatly after in a matter which was very grieuous vnto him. For after the controuerſie betweene the Pope and the Duke of Ferrara was heard and examined by many Doctors to whom it was committed, whereupon both the parties had produced many teſtimonies and writings, and made a long courſe of pleading, he pronounced according to their counſell and relation, that Modena and Reggia appertained of right to the Duke of Ferrara, and that the Pope receiuing of him an hundred thouſand duckats, and reducing the tributes to the ancient cuſtome, ſhould inueſt him againe in the iuriſdiction of Ferrara. Therefore the Emperour laboured to perſwade the Pope, that if contrary to his promiſe made in Bologna, not to pronounce in caſe he found his cauſe not to be iuſt, he had giuen ſentence, that he was not to complaine thereof againſt him, but rather to blame the Biſhop of Vaſone his Nuncio, to whom he had not failed to giue notice that he would not pronounce ſentence, to the end not to be conſtrained to paſſe iudgement againſt the Pope: but the Biſhop being perſwaded otherwiſe, and ſuppoſing this to be done to free himſelfe of the promiſe he had made to giue ſentence if the right were in him, had preſſed ſo much the publication of the ſentence, that he was halfe conſtrained to it for the regard of his honour. Which excuſe the Pope had the ſooner admitted, if the ſentence had not bene in the ſame forme whereinto the Emperour had many times aſſayed to reduce the matter by accord. But that which offended moſt the Pope, was, that the Emperour in pronouncing vpon the matters of Modena and Reggia, had taken the courſe of a rigorous Iudge, but in the affaires of Ferrara, wherein the rigour was manifeſtly for him, he had done the office of a friendly Arbitrator. Therefore he would neither ratifie the ſentence, nor accept the paiment of the money wherein the Duke was condemned; neither did he at the next feaſt of Saint Peter accept the tribute which was publikely offered to him, according to the ancient cuſtome. But the Emperour for all that forbare not to conſigne to the Duke of Ferrara, Modena, which he had detained in pledge till that day, leauing them to decide afterwards the differences betweene themſelues. By reaſon whereof there was not for many moneths betweene the Pope and the Duke of Ferrara either an open warre or an aſſured peace, the Pope wholly applying himſelfe to oppreſſe him with wiles, or to expect an occaſion to wrong him openly with the aide of great Princes.

This yeare of 1531 brought forth no other accidents, and the tranquillitie alſo went on continuing the yeare following, which was more dangerous for forreine warres then for the emotions of Italy. For, the Turke being inflamed with the ignominie of his repulſe at Vienna, and vnderſtanding that the Emperour was in Germanie, he prepared a very mightie army, and magnifying his prouiſions, he publiſhed, that his intention was to conſtraine the Emperour to come to battell with him. For the renowme of which preparations the Emperour put himſelfe in as good order as he could, reuoking into Germanie the Marquis of Guaſt with his Spaniſh regiments, and a great band of horſemen and footmen Italians. The Pope promiſed to aide him with fortie thouſand duckats for euery moneth, and ſent to this expedition as Legat Apoſtolike his nephew the Cardinall de Medicis: and the Princes and free townes of Germanie prepared in fauour of the Emperour, and for the common defence of Germanie, a very great armie: but the effects were nothing anſwerable to the renowme and the feare: for that Soliman, who came very late into Hungarie, and could arriue no ſooner, as well for the greatneſſe of his preparations, as for the length of the way, drew not directly with his army to the place where the Emperor was, but onely hauing repreſented the warre, and made a great incurſion, he returned to Conſtantinople. And in the Emperour there appeared no greater forwardneſſe; for although he vnderſtood that the Turkes drew neare, he made not out to meete them; and when he heard of their retraite, he omitted to purſue with all his forces the faire occaſion that was offered to reconquer Hungarie for his brother; but burning in deſire to returne into Spaine, he gaue order that the Italian footmen, with a certaine number of Lanceknights ſhould go to the enterpriſe of Hungarie; which deſigne was immediatly diſordered, for that the Italians puſhed on by ſome

of their Captaines, who ſaw that the charge of the enterpriſe was giuen to others, ſo mutined, that hauing no reaſon to alleage for their tumult, and the preſence of the Emperour who went in perſon to ſpeake vnto them, being not ſufficient to appeaſe them; they reſolutely tooke their way into Italy, marching with great haſte for feare to be followed, and in their way burning many villages and houſes as lands of their enemies, in reuenge as they ſaid of the burnings committed in many places in Italy by the Lanceknights. The Emperour alſo tooke his way towards Italy, and hauing ſet downe in what order, and by what places his Court and all his traine ſhould paſſe, the Cardinall de Medicis, carried with the raſhneſſe of youth, not obeying the order generally giuen to all the traine, aduanced and got before together with Peter Maria Roſſo, vpon whom chiefly was layed the fault of this ſedition. Wherewith the Emperour being wroth, but chiefly for that attributing the cauſe hereof to the Cardinall, he feared leſt the ſaid Cardinall who was ill contented that Alexander his couſin was preferred to the adminiſtration of the Eſtate of Florence, would go after the footbands to leade them to trouble the affaires of Tuſcan, he cauſed him to be apprehended by the way, and with him Peter Maria Roſſo: but afterwards conſidering better the importance of the matter, he wrote preſently that he ſhould be deliuered, and made many excuſes as well to the Cardinall as to the Pope. Peter Maria remained priſoner, but ſoone after he was releaſed, the iniury which he ſeemed to haue done to the Cardinall, helping him much (as was beleeued) with the Emperour.

Enteruiew of the king of England and the French king.

The departure of the Turke deliuered Italy of an imminent warre: for that the French King and the King of England being full of hatred and diſdaine againſt the Emperour, met together betweene Calice and Bulleine, where perſwading themſelues that the Turke would abide that Winter in Hungarie, and by that meanes would hold the forces of the Emperour intangled, they conſulted that the French king ſhould inuade the Duchie of Millan: and hauing a diſpoſition to draw the Pope to their part by violence and aſtoniſhment, ſeeing they could neuer allure him by other meanes, they deuiſed to take from him the obedience of their kingdomes in caſe he would not conſent to that which they deſired, which was that the French king wold haue the State of Millan, and the King of England a ſentence for him in the cauſe of diuorce; and they had determined to ſend to him with ſharp commiſſions, the Cardinals of Tournon and Tarbes, perſonages of great authoritie with the French king. But the newes which they receiued of the retiring of the Turke before the time of their enteruiew was determined, moderated theſe deuices, and alſo was the cauſe that the King of England ſent not for the Ladie Anne Bulleine to Calice; to celebrate the mariage with her publikely in that aſſembly, notwithſtanding the cauſe of diuorce was hanging in the Court of Rome, and that he was forbidden by writs Apoſtolike, vnder paine of very great cenſures, to innouate any thing to the preiudice of the firſt mariage: and yet the French king to demonſtrate to the King of England that he bare no good will to the Romane Church, impoſed by his owne authoritie vpon the Clergie of all his Realme a taxe of tenths, and diſpatched the two Cardinals to the Pope, but with conditions farre differing from thoſe which were preſcribed at the firſt.

A ſecond enteruiew of the Pope and the Emperour at Bologna.

The Emperour came into Italy, and deſiring to ſpeake with the Pope, the place of their meeting was eſtſoones aſſigned at Bologna, which the Pope accepted willingly, to giue no occaſion to the Emperour to go to the Realme of Naples (as many of his Court perſwaded him,) and by that occaſion to make a longer abode in Italy; which was alſo againſt the intention of the Emperour, who deſired to paſſe into Spaine for many reaſons, but chiefly for the deſire he had to haue children by his wife who remained there. Therefore they met at the end of the yeare at Bologna, where were obſerued betweene them the ſame demonſtrations of amitie, and the ſame offices of familiaritie which they had vſed before; but their wils were no more correſpondent as they had bene in their former negociations. For the Emperour had a great deſire of the Councell, for the repoſe and contentment of Germanie: he offered to diſſolue the armie, which was very chargeable both to him and others; but to the end he might do it ſafely, he inſiſted to haue the laſt league made at Bologna renewed, both to comprehend in it all the Italians, and to taxe the ſummes of money which euery one was to contribute if Italy were inuaded by the French. He deſired alſo to haue Katherine the Popes Neece maried to Francis Sforce, as well to preſſe the Pope by a greater neceſſitie to looke to the preſeruation of that Eſtate, as to breake the practiſe of affinitie that was ſolicited with the French king. Of all which things not one was

acceptable to the Pope, for that the confederation was contrary to the desire he had to stand newter as much as he could betweene the Princes of Christendome: doubting both other dangers, and especially lest the French king (who was so much pressed thereunto by the King of England) would depriue him of the obedience of his kingdome. Touching the Councell, it was a matter very grieuous vnto him for the ancient causes: and the alliance with the Duke of Millan pleased him not, for that he would not be at open enmitie with the French king, with whose second sonne he had a vehement desire to conioyne his Neece. These matters were handled, but principally that of the confederation: and for this negociation of many moneths were deputed for the Emperour, Cuonos, the great Commander of Lions, Granuelle, and Prata his chiefe Counsellors: and for the Pope the Cardinall de Medicis, Iames Saluiati, and Guicciardin: who not refusing to go through with the confederation (for that had bene to discouer too much the Popes intention, and to giue cause to the Emperour iustly to conceiue a great suspition of him,) made instance that all meanes should be vsed to cause the Venetians to consent vnto it, alleaging that without them the defence would be but weake, and that the common affaires would be preserued with better reputation if the renowme of the former confederation were maintained: whereas if another were made without them, it would make the world beleeue that there were discord betweene the Emperour, the Pope, and the Venetians. In this regard the Venetians were solicited to condescend to a new confederation for the defence of all Italy, for as much as by the first League their obligation extended no further then for the affaires of Millan and Naples: and the Emperour was very desirous that they might be bound likewise to the defence of Genes, where it was thought, that when the warre was on foote, the French men would easily make their first attempt: for that they would pretend, by reason of their rights and interests particular, they might do it without swaruing from the contracts of Madril and Cambray. But the Senate of Venice refused to renew the confederation, or to amplifie the obligations contained in the same, whereby they much discontented the Emperour, although they affirmed they would inuiolably obserue that coniunction: and yet the Emperour was so much the more importunate herein with the Pope, refuting all reasons that were alleaged to the contrary, that the articles of the confederation began to be communed vpon; and all the Potentates of Italy were summoned, who sent Embassadours to this negociation: who were required to enter into the League, contributing in case of warre, euery one according to his power and possibilitie: wherein none of them making any difficultie, but labouring euery one to abate somewhat of that which was demanded for the contribution, Alphonso d'Este onely propounded that he might not enter into a league to defend the States of others, if first he were not assured of his owne. For how may it be conuenient for him to accord, that was to defend himselfe against the Pope, and enter league with him? how could he contribute with his money to the defence of Millan and Genes, if he were compelled to expend it continually to keepe bands of souldiers within Modena and Reggia, and also for the suretie of Ferrara? Vpon this demand arose a new practise to accord him with the Pope: who bearing a mind far estranged therefrō, and yet not purposing to oppose himselfe so apparently against the instance of the Emperour, he propounded conditions which were impossible to be obserued, affirming that if he should leaue Modena and Reggia to Alphonso (who otherwise would not come to accord) that he would haue Alphonso to acknowledge them in fealtie of the Sea Apostolike; the which for that it could not be done in such sort as might be iudicially auailable without the consent of the Electors and Princes of the Empire, it brought the Emperour into a difficultie which had no issue. Therefore he began to intreate the Pope, that at least during the league he would be bound not to vexe the State which Alphonso held: and after many disputes, the Pope consented to assure him for eighteene moneths; and so at last there was a conclusion made of the League, which was passed and contracted vpon Saint Matthias day; a day very happie to the Emperour. This league and confederation contained an obligation of the Emperour, the King of Romanes, and all the other Potentates of Italy except the Venetians, for the defence of Italy, yet without naming the Florentines therein any otherwise then they were named in the league of Congnac, and that to the end not to trouble their commerce in the Realme of France. It was set downe with what number of souldiers euery one should be concurrant therein, and what summe of money they should contribute for euery moneth, to wit, for the Emperour thirtie thousand duckats, the Pope for himselfe and the Florentines twentie thousand, the Duke of Millan

A League for the defence of Italy.

Ian fifteene thouſand, the Duke of Ferrara ten thouſand, the Genowayes ſixe thouſand, the State of Sienna ten thouſand, and the Citie of Lucques a thouſand: and that (to the end to be found prepared againſt all ſodaine and vnlooked for inuaſions vntil ſuch time as defence might be made with the contributions aforenamed) there ſhould be preſently leuied a loane of money almoſt equall to the contributions, which ſhould not be expended vnleſſe the preparations to inuade Italy were manifeſtly diſcerned. There was alſo ſet downe a ſmall contribution yearely, for the entertainment of thoſe Captaines that remained in Italy, and to pay certaine penſions to the Swiſſers, to the end they might not haue cauſe to giue footmen to the French king: and by common conſent Anthonie de Leua was declared Captaine generall of all the League, with ordinance that he ſhould remaine in the Duchie of Millan.

The Pope will not hearken to a Councell.

Touching the Councell there was nothing concluded to the liking of the Emperour, who ſolicited the Pope to call it preſently; which he refuſed to do, alleaging that in that ill diſpoſition of mens minds, there was danger leſt the Kings of England and France would refuſe it, and that the Councell being celebrated without them, it could introduce neither vnion nor reformation of the Church: yea, it was much to be feared leſt it would diuolue to a ſchiſme: That he was very well content to ſend out Nuncios to all the Princes, to induce them to ſo holy a worke. And the Emperour replying, What if they differ from vs without iuſt cauſe? and preſſing the Pope in that caſe to intimate the Councell, he could neuer diſpoſe him to it: ſo that his Nuncios were aſſigned and ſent out, with a very ſlender hope to bring backe any good concluſion. But the Emperour was no better ſatisfied touching the negociation of the affinitie; for that when the two Cardinals ſent by the French king were come to Bologna, and had introduced againe the negociation of the mariage with the ſecond ſonne of the King, the Pope gaue anſwer touching the mariage with the Duke of Millan propounded by the Emperour: That the King hauing long before made an ouerture of mariage for his ſonne, and he hauing hearkened vnto it by the conſent of the Emperour, who at that time ſeemed to be well content therewith, he ſuppoſed he ſhould do great wrong to the French king, if during theſe negociations he ſhould giue his Neece in mariage to one of his enemies: That he was perſwaded, that that practiſe was artificially introduced by the French king to entertaine him, and not with intention to conclude it; ſeeng there was betweene the parties ſo great diſparitie of degree and condition; but that he would not do the King ſo great wrong, if this practiſe were not firſt abſolutely broken off. And when the Emperour could not be perſwaded that the French king would adioyne his ſonne to a match ſo farre vnequall to him, he aduiſed the Pope, that for the diſcouerie of the Kings frauds, he ſhould preſſe the Cardinals to ſend for a procuration to make the contract, who ſhewing themſelues very forward herein, cauſed it to be accompliſhed in few dayes in very ample forme: by reaſon whereof, not onely all hope of affinitie with Francis Sforce was loſt, but alſo the ſolicitation with the French king was followed more hotely; and thereunto was further addled (according to the deuice betweene them long before) that the Pope and the French king ſhould contract together at Nice, a Citie belonging to the Duke of Sauoy, ſtanding vpon the riuer of Var, which ſeparateth Italy from Prouence. Theſe things were very offenſiue to the Emperour, as well for a ſuſpition leſt betweene the Pope and the French king there would be concluded a greater coniunction to his preiudice (for he knew well enough how much the French king deſired it,) as for feare leſt the Pope ſhould call to mind his impriſonment, the ſack of Rome, and the mutation of Florence, being moued alſo with diſdaine, for that the honour which the Pope had done to him in making two iourneys to Bologna to ſpeake with him, would be diminiſhed, yea aboliſhed, if he ſhould go ſo farre as Nice to meete with the French king. And he diſſembled not this diſpleaſure and the cauſes thereof, but in vaine; for that in the Popes mind was fixed an ardent deſire of this affinitie, being moued rather by ambition and appetite of glorie, in that being of a houſe in a maner ſimple and priuate, he had obtained for a baſtard Nephew of his, a baſtard daughter of ſo mightie an Emperour, and now ſhould obtaine for his Neece legitimate, a legitimate ſonne of the French king; then induced by that which many counſelled him, to wit, that by the meanes of that affinitie he might giue colour of right (though more apparent then true) to pretend for his ſonne and for his daughter in law the Eſtate of Florence. To theſe diſcontentments of the Emperour was added, almoſt as a full accompliſhment, that making inſtance to the Pope to create three Cardinals by him propounded, he obtained it with difficultie onely for the Archbiſhop of Bary, the Pope excuſing himſelfe vpon the contradiction diction of the Colledge of Cardinals: neither was the Emperour appeaſed by the readineſſe of the Pope to make a ſecret confederation with him, wherein he promiſed to proceed iudicially to the cenſures, and to all things that he might rightly do againſt the King of England, and againſt Anne Bolleine: and they bound themſelues to make no new confederations or accords with any Princes, without the reciprocall conſent one of another. The Emperour departed from Bologna the day after the confederation was contracted, being now well aſſured in himſelf, that the ſaid mariage would go on, together with the enterpriſe betweene the Pope and the French king, and doubted alſo of ſome greater coniunction. Being embarked at Genes, he paſſed into Spaine, with a firme purpoſe (as it is reported) if the mariage of Katherine de Medicis were celebrated with the ſecond ſonne of France, to diſſolue the match made betweene his daughter and Alexander de Medicis. Not many dayes after the Pope departed to go to Rome, accompanied with the two French Cardinals, nothing troubled with the new confederation, for that the Pope, who excelled in ſimulations and practiſes, wherein he was not ſurmounted with feare, had told them, that vpon concluding the League the Spaniſh armie was to diſſolue, which would do the French king more good then the confederation could endomage him; chiefly ſeeing that as well for the obligations as the obſeruation thereof, there might happen many difficulties and ſundry impediments.

Thus the practiſes begun continued betweene them: and the King deſiring for his honour, and for ambition rather then for any other thing, that the Pope ſhould come to Nice, he promiſed (to draw him thither) not to require of him any confederation, nor to incenſe him to war, and much leſſe to draw him from termes of iuſtice in the cauſe of the King of England, nor to importune him to create new Cardinals: and he was much puſhed on herein by the King of England, who had now ſolemnely maried the Lady Anne Bolleine, by whom hauing procreated a daughter, he had, to the preiudice of the daughter of his firſt wife, declared her Princeſſe of the Realme of England; a title which is transferred to ſuch as are neareſt the Crowne: by reaſon whereof, the Pope not able to diſſemble ſo great a contempt againſt the Sea Apoſtolike, nor to refuſe iuſtice to the Emperour, had with the aduice of the Conſiſtory, publiſhed that King guiltie of the crime of contempt; which cauſed him to deſire the affinitie and enteruiew of the Pope with the French king, hoping the King would be a meanes to remedie his cauſe; and that the Pope being induced (as he hoped) to commune of new matters againſt the Emperour, he would deſire to reſtore him, and to draw him into their coniunction, and as it were to conſtitute almoſt a Triumuirate, to giue lawes to the affaires of Italy. At laſt his going was concluded, but not to Nice; for that the Duke of Sauoy, not to diſpleaſe the Emperor, made difficultie to grant the Caſtle to the Pope; but to Marſeilles, according to the Kings deſire, who eſteemed it a matter more honorable for him, that the enteruiew ſhould be made in his kingdome, and with the contentment of the Pope, as one that deſired to ſatisfie him more with demonſtrations, and in pleaſing his ambition, then with effects. The Pope laboured to perſwade all men, that he went to this enteruiew principally to ſolicite peace, to perſwade the enterpriſe againſt the Infidels, and to reduce the King of England to good wayes; and laſtly, onely for the common intereſts. But being not able to diſſemble the true cauſe, before he departed he ſent his Neece to Nice vpon the gallies which the Duke of Albanie Vncle to the yong Lady, had brought out of France to paſſe the Pope: which gallies after they had brought the Lady to Nice, returned to the port of Piſa, and on the fourth of October they took the perſon of the Pope with many Cardinals, whom with a very happie nauigation they brought in few dayes to Marſeilles; where when he had made his ſolemne entrie, the French king, who had viſited him before by night, entred ſoone after. They were lodged in one and the ſame Pallace, and vſed very great demonſtrations of amitie: and the King, who eſpecially laboured to win him, prayed him to ſend for his Neece to Marſeilles; which being willingly performed by the Pope, who ſpake not thereof to the King, to ſhew that he would firſt debate of the common affaires; as ſoone as the Ladie was come, the contracts were made, and with as much ſpeed the conſummation of the mariage, to the incredible ioy of the Pope, who handled his matters ſo cunningly with the King, that the King became wonderfull confident in him, and ſhewed him great affection: neuertheleſſe contrary to the opinion of all men, and of the Emperour himſelfe, no capitulation was paſſed betweene them. It is very true that the Pope ſhewed himſelfe alwayes deſirous that the State of Millan might be gotten for the Duke of Orleans husband to his Neece; a matter which the

Katherine de Medicis maried to the ſecond ſon of France.

King desired much, for a hatred and disdaine he bare to the Emperour, but much more for that the Duke of Orleans being put into such an Estate, he thought that would quench the occasions of contention betweene his children after his death, which otherwise he feared might fall amongst them for the title of the Duchie of Brittaine, which the King in the yeare before (contrary to the couenants made by King Lewis with those people) had vnited to the Crowne of France, whereunto he had induced the subiects of that State to consent, more by his kingly authoritie, then of their owne inclination: and not onely the King obtained nothing of him in the cause of the King of England, but also for the inciuilities of his seruants, and for that they were found in the Popes chamber, protesting and appealing from him to the Councell, shewing himselfe angrie, he told the Pope, it should nothing offend him, if he pursued their King and his cause according to the rule of iustice. He offended not the Popes mind in any thing, sauing that rather to satisfie some about him then himselfe, he intreated him to create three Cardinals in his fauour; which was a matter not a litle discontenting to the Pope, not so much for the instance which the Emperours Embassadour made to the contrary, as for that he esteemed it a matter of great consequence, both for the election of future Popes, and for the disobediences which might happen in his life and after, to adde so many Cardinals to the French nation, which had already sixe. Neuertheless for a lesse euill, he consented to this demand; and besides these he created a brother of the Duke of Albanie, to whom he had before promised the Cardinals Hat. In regard of all other things there seemed to be betweene them great affiance and contentment, the French king hauing communicated vnto him many of his counsels, and among others his determination to stirre vp against the Emperour some of the Princes of Germanie, and chiefly the Lantgraue van Hesse, and the Duke of Wertemberg, who the Sommer following drew into commotion. When they had remained at Marseilles about a moneth, the Pope returned vpon the same gallies; with the which, after he had bene much tormented vpon the sea, being arriued at Sauona, neither trusting to the prouision of the gallies, nor the skill of those that gouerned them, he sent them backe, and was conducted to Ciuitauecchia in the gallies of Andrew Dore: and being returned to Rome, with very great reputation and wonderfull felicitie, especially to such as had seene him prisoner in the Castle of Saint Angelo, he enioyed the full fauour of fortune for a few moneths, presaging already in his mind, that which was speedily to happen. For it is manifest, that almost as soone as he was returned from Marseilles, as if he were assured of his death which approched, he caused the Ring to be made, and all the other habites accustomed to bury Popes, assuring his familiars, with a very setled mind, that he should speedily die. And yet not leauing his accustomed cares and studies, he solicited, as he thought, for the greater suretie of his house, to build a very strong Citadell within Florence, not knowing how soone the felicitie of his Nephewes was to end, of whom, being mortall enemies one to another, Hippolito the Cardinal died before the end of the yeare after the Popes death, not without suspition of poison, and Alexander the other Nephew, who commanded at Florence, was (with great note of indiscretion) secretly slaine by night in Florence by Laurence of the same family of Medicis.

The Pope fell sicke about the beginning of Sommer, and his griefe was a paine of the stomacke, whereunto a feauer being conioyned, and being a long time tormented with that and other accidents, sometimes he seemed to be reduced to the point of death, and sometimes so eased, that he gaue to others, but not to himselfe, an hope of recouery. During the time of which malady, the Duke of Wertemberg by the aide of the Lantgraue van Hesse and other Princes, and the helpe of the money of France, recouered the Duchie of wertemberg, which the King of Romanes possessed: and these fearing a greater combustion, agreed with the King of Romanes, against the will of the French king, who was in hope that the Emperour in regard of these emotions, would stand intangled with a long and tedious warre, and that haply their armies being victorious, would descend vpon the Duchie of Millan. In like sort at that time Barberosa being made Bassa and Captaine generall of Solimans army by sea, passed to the conquest of the kingdome of Thunis, and in his way thither he ouerran the sea coasts of Calabria, and ran vp aboue Caietta, by meanes whereof some of his souldiers being set on land, sacked Fondy, with such a feare to the Court and peoples of Rome, as it was supposed, if they had passed further, that the Citie of Rome had bin left abandoned. But this accident was kept from the knowledge of the Pope, who at last being no longer able to resist his malady, departed out of this life the fiue and twen-

Death of Pope Clement the 7.

twentieth day of September, leauing behind him in the Caſtle of Saint Angelo many iewels, in the Pontificall Chamber infinite offices, but contrary to the opinion of all men a very ſmall ſumme of money. He was raiſed from baſe degree to the place of Popedome with a wonderfull felicitie: but being Pope he had experience of a very great varietie of fortune: and if both were euenly ballanced, his euill fortune was farre greater then his good. For what felicitie may be compared to the miſery of his impriſonment? to haue ſeene the ſacke of Rome, with ſo great a ruine and deſtruction? and that he was the cauſe of ſo great deſolation to his countrey? He died hated of the Court, ſuſpected of Princes, and with a fame rather hatefull then acceptable: being accounted couetous, of ſmall fidelitie, and naturally farre off from doing pleaſures to men: by reaſon whereof, albeit during the time of his Pontificacie he created one and thirtie Cardinals, he neuer made any to content himſelfe, but almoſt alwayes by neceſſitie, except the Cardinall de Medicis, whom (when he was oppreſſed with a dangerous malady, and at ſuch a time as if he had died, he had left his friends and kindred in the ſtate of beggers, and depriued of all aide) he created Cardinall rather at the perſwaſion of others then by his proper and voluntary election; and yet he was very graue, well aduiſed in his actions, a conqueror of himſelfe, and of a great ſpirit, if timorouſneſſe had not oftentimes corrupted his iudgement. When he was dead, the Cardinals who ſhut themſelues the ſame night into the Conclaue, elected in his place with full voice Alexander, of the family of Farneſe, a Romane by nation, and the moſt ancient Cardinall of all the Court: their voices being found conformable to the iudgement and (in a maner) inſtance that Clement had made, as of a perſon worthy to be preferred before all the others to ſo great a degree, ſeeing he was both learned, and of good life in appearance: and the Cardinals elected him the more willingly, for that he being already vpon the threeſcore and ſeuenth yeare of his age, and ſuppoſed to be of a weake complexion and ſickly, which opinion he nouriſhed with art, they had ſome hope he would not ſit long in the ſeate: the actions and operations of whom, whether they anſwered the expectation conceiued of him, or the incredible ioy which the people of Rome tooke, to haue after the end of an hundred and three yeares, and after the ſucceſſion of thirteene Popes, a Pope of bloud a Romane, thoſe may beare witneſſe who ſhall write of the accidents hapning in Italy after his election. For the prouerbe is very true, and well to be noted, which ſaith, The office ſetteth out the worthineſſe of the perſon that manageth it.
